Hints 'Cowardice' By North Dakotan

Crowded Chamber Hears Bitter Speech; Nye Sits Quietly.

By Felix Bruner.

Trembling with rage and indignation, his voice crackling with anger, Senator Carter Glass (Democrat), Virginia, stood in the Senate yesterday and directed to Senator Gerald P. Nye (Republican), North Dakota, such an oral lashing as has seldom been heard in that historic body.

The 78-year-old Virginian was defending the memory of his old friend and chief, Woodrow Wilson. Nye, chairman of the Senate Munitions Committee, had just repeated his charge that Wilson and Robert Lansing, war-time Secretary of State, had "falsified" when they testified in 1919 that they knew nothing of secret treaties among the Allies until they went to the Peace Conference in Paris.

No sooner had Glass ended his biting attack on Nye than Democratic Floor Leader Joseph T. Robinson and Senator James F. Byrnes (Democrat), of South Carolina, turned on the North Dakotan after a revelation that the Munitions Committee, in addition to the sums appropriated to it by the Senate, secretly had drawn on relief funds, using $23,000 supplied by New York City and State in financing its investigation.

There was a hushed silence in the packed galleries as Glass, who was Secretary of the Treasury during the late months of the Wilson Administration, arose to answer the deliberate charges of Nye, charges that were a repetition of those made last Wednesday in the Munitions Committee.

Restrained by Senate Rules.

"If it were permissible in the Senate to say that any man who would asperse the integrity and veracity of Woodrow Wilson is a coward," Glass began, pointing a shaking finger toward the young North Dakota Senator, "that I would be glad to say here and elsewhere to any man, whether he be a United States Senator or not."

Referring again to the Nye charge, the fiery little Senator continued:

"I resent it as every American citizen who knew Woodrow Wilson would resent it, as an infamous libel, whether suggested or directly made."

He brought his right hand down with such force that the skin burst and blood spattered over the litter of papers on the desk top.

"From time to time," Glass continued, "it has been suggested in the newspapers that members of this committee were going to present to the country shocking revelations. It remained until day before yesterday to present anything of a shocking nature; and that was the unspeakable accusation against a dead President, dirt-daubing the sepulchre of Woodrow Wilson."

Standing Room Taxed.

Word of the dramatic speech had spread to the House and the rear of the Senate chamber began to fill with Representatives who soon occupied nearly all the standing room.

"Everybody who came in contact with the then President of the United States knows perfectly well that he wanted to be neutral. To some of us he was vastly too neutral, and was bitterly assailed by men of the type of Theodore Roosevelt and others for not taking this country into war two years before we entered the war. * * *

"Why, everybody knows, except the Senator from North Dakota, that Woodrow Wilson came near wrecking his life at Versailles in his protestation against carrying out terms of certain secret treaties. * * *

"It has been asserted here that the Government had unrestricted right to refuse to permit the banking interests of this country to sell their credit abroad during the early stages of the World War. I have not had the time to examine the statutes on the subject, but to me it seems an incredible assertion. * * *

"Oh, the miserable demagogy, the miserable and mendacious suggestion, that the House of Morgan

New Battleship Program Seen If Parley Fails

Congress Leaders to Seek Building, Modernizing Past Treaty Limit.

By Robert C. Albright.

A new battleship replacement program, and swift moves to place the Navy on a treaty basis or better, will be considered by Congress when and if it becomes apparent the remaining four powers at London cannot agree on navy limits, it was said at the Capitol last night.

With three battleships already "obsolete," and four others becoming overage within the year, moves were under way in both the House Naval Affairs and Appropriations Committee to overcome United States "inferiority" in the capital ship class, as result of the present building holiday.

Holding all plans in abeyance pending more definite word from London, Chairman Carl Vinson, of the House Naval Affairs Committee, nevertheless predicted last night that failure of the conference will result in action this session looking to a program of periodic replacement and modernization of present overage craft.

At the same time, Representative Clarence J. McLeod (Republican), Michigan, a member of the Naval Appropriation sub-committee, which opens hearings next week, served notice that he will "insist that our Navy be placed upon a basis which would make it adequate to meet whatever demands may be made upon it for the preservation of our safety and future peace."

On the other side of the Capitol, Senator Park Trammel, of Florida, chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, said he favored building the Navy to treaty limits "as rapidly as possible," and advancing beyond those limits if the other powers lead the way. He said steps should be taken at once to build up the naval establishment at Manila.

Pointing out that under existing treaty agreements, the United States may not lay down any battleship replacements until January 1, 1937, even though its capital ships are over-age (20 years or older), Representative Vinson said:

"Under present authorizations, we will not reach treaty strength until 1945. There are no plans I know of to go beyond that except as regards battleship requirements.

"Just now we must wait on the outcome of the London conference. There may, of course, be some agreement between the four powers

Army of 15,000 Routed by Italy; 5,000 Are Slain

By the United Press.

Rome (Saturday), Jan. 18.—Ras Desta Demtu's Southern Ethiopian army, estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000 warriors, was virtually annihilated during Gen. Rodolfo Graziani's terrific five-day offensive in the Dolo sector of the southern front, reliable reports from Mogadiscio, Italian Somaliland, said today.

Up to last night the Ethiopian known dead totaled nearly 5,000 and it was estimated conservatively that 6,000 were wounded. Italian casualties were said to have amounted to about 500, mostly wounded.

It was ascertained, the reports said, that more than 1,000 of the Ethiopian dead were killed during a vicious bayonet charge by Italian troops. Most of the remainder reportedly were killed by machine gun fire.

The remnants of the army led by Ras Desta Demtu, son-in-law of Emperor Haile Selassie, were reported fleeing in disorder to the Northwest, offering only feeble resistance to the pursuing Italian troops. Many Ethiopian rear guards have surrendered, it was reported.

Defense Tightened.

With the right wing Italian army in northern Ethiopia, Jan. 17 (AP).—Marshal Pietro Badoglio's northern Italian army has laid down a tremendous defensive line in this sector, believing tonight the real battle of the war will be fought in the vicinity of the holy city of Aksum.

Defense preparations included a web of machine guns and artillery emplacements 10 miles beyond Askum. The holy city itself is defended by barbed wire.

(Aksum was taken by the Italians without the firing of a shot October 13, only ten days after the Italian invasion of Ethiopia began.

(The city is west of Aduwa and northwest of Makale, advance Italian point. The dispatch saying the Fascists are preparing to defend it tends to confirm Ethiopian claims that the Italians have been withdrawing in northwestern Ethiopia.)

Roper Turns Fishy Eye on Fight Of Siam's 2-Inch Fin Wielders

Mayhem is undesirable, even if the victim is only a Siamese fighting fish, Secretary of Commerce Roper ruled yesterday, and consequently the duel between "Tampa" and "New Orleans" which was to have been staged on a coast-to-coast network next month is off—canceled—banned.

Fred G. Orsinger, director of the Commerce aquarium, where the battle was to have been held, February 6, was inconsolable when he heard of the reprieve.

"It's a pity, a pity," he said. "After all our arrangements. Invitations ready to go out, a 15-minute broadcast scheduled, the Humane Society notified that a representative would be welcome and when he thought the going was getting too rough he was to stop hostilities."

For weeks Orsinger has been planning the fight. The scrappers were to have been two Siamese battlers, each only 2 inches long, but sportsmen and warriors to the last inch. They have been christened "Tampa" and "New Orleans" and newspapers in those cities have been running stories daily on their entries' workouts.

Orsinger had not overlooked a single detail. The Boxing Commission had been informed of the goings on, plans had been arranged to accommodate a soup-and-fish clien-

Treasury Job Is Resigned By Coolidge

Robert Also Quits Office as Assistant, White House Reveals.

By Franklyn Waltman, Jr.

Thomas Jefferson Coolidge's resignation as Undersecretary of the Treasury yesterday was submitted because of irreconcilable objections which he holds to certain fundamental New Deal policies, The Post was informed on the highest authority.

Unable to give whole-hearted support to all the policies of President Roosevelt, Mr. Coolidge believed it was his duty to resign from the Administration. Close friends explained that there was no single policy on which the Treasury Undersecretary disagreed with the Administration, but that he could not support several policies, which created an intolerable situation for him.

The Treasury's only remaining link with the conservative elements in the financial and business world, Mr. Coolidge enjoyed the respect of the banking fraternity. He is the only high-ranking official now in the Treasury who had practical banking experience, and it has been reported that he exercised a moderating influence on some Treasury policies.

Mr. Coolidge's resignation was revealed when the White House made public an exchange of correspondence, which did not disclose specifically the reasons for his departure from the Administration, effective February 15. No consideration has been given so far to finding a successor for Mr. Coolidge, it was said at the White House and Treasury.

Sympathy for New Deal.

The White House at the same time announced the resignation of L. W. ("Chip") Robert, jr., as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Robert's resignation, long expected, was submitted in order that he may return to private business. In his letter of resignation, Mr. Robert indicated ardent sympathy and support for the New Deal.

The Coolidge resignation came as a surprise and is expected to have widespread political repercussions, even though the Undersecretary does not raise his voice against the Administration, as have some others who previously resigned from the Treasury because of the policies being pursued.

Mr. Coolidge has no complaint against the policies followed by the Treasury in raising billions of dollars required for financing of New Deal projects. Indeed, he has been personally in charge of such financial operations. His opposition, however, has been directed against some of the policies which have put such a heavy strain on the Treasury's resources.

Intimations Given.

Intimations were given by his friends, for instance, that the Undersecretary favored turning the unemployment relief problem back to the States and local communities much more promptly than is now being done.

The youthful Boston banker had become anxious not only regarding those policies which are keeping the Treasury deficit at a high peak, but also over other tendencies of New Deal policy which in recent months have taken definite and concrete form.

The exact nature of his objections were not revealed—since he apparently wishes his departure from the Administration to cause it the least possible embarrassment. It is known that Mr. Coolidge has been concerned over maintenance of the traditional relationship between Federal and State governments and between the executive, legislative and judicial divisions of the Federal government. The Administration's attitude toward the Supreme Court, it was intimated, has disturbed him.

Hoffman Says He Has Doubt Case Is Solved

Governor Is Not Certain That Hauptmann Ever Was in Nursery.

Evidence to Discredit Some Witnesses to Be Disclosed.

By the Associated Press.

Trenton, N. J., Jan. 17.—Gov. Harold G. Hoffman defended his reprieve of Bruno Richard Hauptmann today with a statement defying impeachment proceedings, attacking the prosecution and expressing his own doubts that the condemned man ever was in the Lindbergh nursery.

Only a few hours before Hauptmann would have walked the six paces from his death cell to the electric chair but for the 30-day reprieve, the Governor struck back sharply at critics of his mysterious activities in the case.

"I am worried," he said, "about the eagerness of some of our law enforcement agencies to bring about the death of this one man so that the books may be closed in the thought that another great crime mystery has been successfully solved."

In a cablegram to Dr. John F. (Jafsie) Condon, ransom intermediary, in Panama, the attorney general said Condon was not wanted here for further questioning and that the Governor's reprieve was regretted by him (Wilentz).

This cablegram answered one from Condon containing an offer to return voluntarily in view of the Governor's recent expression of a desire to have him examined further.

"Regrets" Course.

"I regret the course taken by the Governor," Wilentz told Condon, "only because it may be construed as a reflection upon the State, the State's witnesses, the police authorities of the several States and of the Nation, who participated in gathering and presenting the evidence.

"The Governor has assigned no reason for granting the reprieve. No new evidence has been called to my attention by the Governor or the defense counsel."

But the Governor's statement, issued soon after Wilentz's cablegram to Condon, asserted that evidence he had which would be disclosed "in due course" caused him to "question the truthfulness and mental competency of some of the chief witnesses for the State."

"I doubt," the Governor added, "that this crime could have been committed by one man."

Wilentz, from his Perth Amboy office, would not comment on the Governor's attack, saying he had not yet read it, but might reply to it tomorrow.

As the sharp exchange occurred between his prosecutor and the man who has interested himself in his behalf, Hauptmann rose to what would have been his last day of life—his execution was set for 8 p. m. today—and received a visit from his wife, Anna, and his spiritual adviser, the Rev. John Matthiesen.

Mrs. Hauptmann was smiling happily when she came out. In midafternoon she left for New York, with a growing belief on her part that her husband would not die in the electric chair.

Reprieve Signed.

The reprieve, extending his span of life 60 to 90 days by reason of the requirement for the setting of a new death date, was signed by Gov. Hoffman and delivered to Col. Mark O. Kimberling, principal keeper of the prison.

Though addressed to Hauptmann himself, it will not be shown the prisoner, but will be put on file, Kimberling said.

With Hauptmann's present death sentence expiring tomorrow night—it was set for "the week of January 13"—reports circulated that a taxpayers' legal move would be taken to force the prison warden to carry out the execution.

High legal authorities doubted, however, that action of this kind

Ellsworth Safe on Rescue Ship; Both Explorer and Co-Pilot Well

By the Associated Press.

London, Jan. 17.—Lincoln Ellsworth and his co-pilot were safe aboard a rescue ship tonight, dramatically snatched from death in the icy Antarctic.

Both were well, although Ellsworth, noted explorer, was suffering from a slight cold.

The rescue ship Discovery II, sent out jointly by the British and Canadian governments, found Ellsworth and Herbert Hollick-Kenyon, his English-Canadian co-pilot, yesterday in Little America.

An official of the colonial office said the airmen, who started out from the Weddell Sea to make the first flight across the Antarctic continent, had provisions sufficient only to sustain them until next Firday.

He had no information, however, that there were supplies in caches left by the Byrd expedition, as reported in Washington by Dr. Thomas C. Poulter, second in command of the Byrd party.

Ellsworth and Hollich-Kenyon had not been reported since November 23.

Wireless messages from the relief expedition disclosed Ellsworth and Hollick-Kenyon ran out of fuel on their daring and successful flight across the South Polar wastes. A damaged radio transmitter kept them from sending out word of their plight.

While the men rested, the colonial office in London, 9,000 miles away, anxiously awaited further details of the rescue and of the successful flight—both of which added important chapters to the gripping history of Antarctic exploration.

Hope for the men's safety had been abandoned by many, but not by their immediate families and other explorers.

This seven-word message from the commander of the Discovery II, Lieut. L. C. Hill, told the world the fliers were safe:

"Ellsworth and Kenyon are both alive and well," it said. A later

'The Light That Failed': 1865-1936

Wales, Queen Mary At Monarch's Side

Anxious Crowd Gathers Before Sandringham Palace Gates.

By the United Press.

London (Saturday), Jan. 18.—Oxygen was rushed to King George V at Sandringham Palace early today as the aged monarch's condition from bronchial catarrh and a weakening heart became worse, it was announced officially.

The announcement was followed by the cautious statement the King was "less comfortable," and that two nurses were at his bedside, in addition to three of the most distinguished physicians in England.

A 3 a. m. announcement said the King was sleeping peacefully.

On the heels of an official bulletin issued by the King's physicians that the monarch, suffering from bronchial catarrh, had developed "signs of a cardiac weakness regarded with disquiet," the report that oxygen was being administered caused grave concern for the aged sovereign's life.

He is 70 years old and has been in delicate health since he nearly died in 1928 from a severe case of pneumonia. At that time, two operations were performed to drain his lungs and his doctors said it was a "miracle" that he recovered.

Family at Side.

The Prince of Wales, Queen Mary and several others of the royal family were at Sandringham Palace with the King tonight. His personal physician, Lord Dawson of Penn, assisted by the most distinguished physicians in London, was in constant attendance.

A strong police force was stationed about the palace grounds and all unauthorized persons were forbidden to enter. A crowd gathered in the drive near the gates asking for information of the King's condition. Guards, as well as officials at the palace lodge, refused to answer questions.

It was understood by officials at the lodge that the royal family had gone to bed early.

It was believed that activities of jubilee year, celebrating the quarter-century mark of King George's reign, had weakened him and induced his present illness, in spite of extreme care taken to guard his failing health.

Heart Strain Indicated.

London physicians pointed out that oxygen was one of the most common aids for embarassment of breathing associated with bronchial catarrh and that such added difficulty in breathing places an extra strain on heart muscles—hence the reference in the official bulletin to cardiac weakness.

The King's heart was exceptionally strong until after his illness of 1928. His strong heart and excellent constitution were credited then with his recovery from an illness so serious that for a time a council of state acted in the King's stead and his death was expected momentarily.

Nazis Declare Germany Must Have Colonies

Time Coming When They Will Be Demanded, Goebbels Warns.

By the Associated Press.

Berlin, Jan. 17.—Dr. Paul Joseph Goebbels, Nazi minister of propaganda, in a defiant speech before a mass meeting of 25,000 persons tonight, warned the world Germany sooner or later must have colonies and "the time is coming when we must demand colonies."

"It cannot go on like this," the Hitler lieutenant declared. "There are countries which have more colonies than they know what to do with."

Referring to the Italo-Ethiopian conflict, Goebbels said: "The Italian people also must live somehow.

"Sooner or later a boiler must explode. Whether in this particular case the methods employed are correct is a matter on which I reserve judgment."

Germany does not intend to meddle in any way in the "English-Italian-Ethiopian conflict," the minister continued, "but what others possess we also must possess.

"We will not put up with this indefinitely. We were lashed into a treaty (Versailles) which not statesmen, but only cowards, signed."

Goebbels bluntly warned the augmented Soviet army to watch its step.

"If the Red army crosses our border we will chase it out with our Prussian Grenadier regiments," he asserted.

Goebbels also took a fling at the American press, "which accuses us of persecuting Jews. They should first see to it that American national heroes do not have to flee from their own country."

The passionate two-hour speech, delivered in Deutschland Hall, also included sarcastic references to German citizens "who worry about a butter or egg shortage when what the fatherland urgently needs is raw materials for its re-armament program."

"If the fatherland should be attacked we cannot throw butter at the enemy," continued Goebbels. "We have got to have cannon."

The sacrifices demanded of the German people at this time are heavy, he said, because "we are making up for what others neglected for 15 years."

Kipling, 70, Dies In London; Won Fame as Writer

By the Associated Press.

London (Saturday), Jan. 18.—Rudyard Kipling, famed British writer of tales and poems of India, died suddenly at 12:10 a. m. today in Middlesex Hospital, less than five days after he had undergone an operation for a perforated stomach ulcer.

Although he had not spoken and had shown almost no visible signs of life for several hours, even his nurses were not aware his end was so near.

Snow fell outside and the entire hospital was still when the dramatic announcement of Kipling's death was made. An excited messenger burst into a waiting room and in a voice filled with emotion cried, "Mr. Kipling is dead."

While it had been admitted the writer's condition was "extremely critical" during the evening, periodic bulletins issued up to shortly before his death said his condition was unchanged.

Immediately before the end, however, Dr. A. E. Webb-Johnson, realizing it was unlikely that Kipling had sufficient strength to rally, warned Mrs. Kipling, who was at the bedside with their daughter, to prepare for the worst.

Occasionally during the last hours, Mrs. Kipling had leaned forward and gently stroked her husband's hand, but he was too weary to make any sign of recognition.

Only at the end, which came peacefully, did he seem to recognize his wife and daughter. The two women, worn out with grief after their long vigil and almost in a state of collapse, were put to bed by the hospital staff soon after the noted author died.

Kipling's body lay this morning in the simple bed in the private hospital room with cream-tinted walls which he had occupied since the emergency operation. A bouquet of flowers stood near the window.

The body was expected to remain in this room until preliminary arrangements for interment are made. It may be taken to the hospital

Freighter Rammed In River Fog, Sinks

Jacksonville, Fla., Jan. 17 (U.P.).—The 5,120-ton British freighter Welcombe sank near the mouth of St. Johns River tonight after being rammed by the steamship Cherokee in dense fog.

No injuries were reported as the British vessel settled and rested on the bottom of the river. All accommodations remained above water.

The crash occurred at 6:55 p. m. as the 5,896-ton Cherokee, Clyde-Mallory Line coastwise passenger steamer out of New York, felt its way down stream toward the open sea. The Welcombe was lying at anchor, waiting for a break in the fog before proceeding.

The Cherokee's bow was ripped open by the collision. The American steamer stood by, waiting for tugs to enable it to return to Jacksonville.

Both Capt. J. Snaith, master of the Welcombe, and Capt. Davidson, of the Cherokee, informed the Coast Guard here that there was no immediate danger.

500 Trapped as Raging River Breaks Levees, Floods Town

By the Associated Press.

Colusa, Calif., Jan. 17.—Approximately 500 persons were trapped tonight as the rampaging Sacramento River flooded Butte City and spread over more than 30,000 acres.

Levees crumbled along a 15-mile front north of here.

Three levee breaks on the east side of the river, swollen by heavy rains of the last week, were reported by weary crews of relief workers.

Princeton, a town of about 600 population on the west side of the stream a few miles south of Butte City, requested aid in a fight to strengthen a threatened check dam.

Only boats could reach Butte City and the immediate area, where people were trapped in their homes by from 3 to 5 feet of water. They were not believed in immediate danger.

Fears of famine in the little dairy and trading community were expressed.

Hundreds of head of livestock were driven to higher land.

Travel on the main East Side highway up the Sacramento Valley was halted. Some automobiles were reported marooned.

Most of the land inundated was pasture, but considerable crop and orchard acreage was included.

Bonus by Bond Issue Forecast Even Over Veto

Senate Leaders Predict Its Passage as Plans for Vote Are Pressed.

Grimly announcing that the "baby" bond bonus bill will become law even over a Presidential veto, Senate leaders, admitting several efforts to win White House approval, pressed for passage of the measure today in the Senate under stringent debate limitations.

"I think the President can very easily sign this bill, and I hope very much that he will sign it," Chairman Pat Harrison, of the Senate Finance Committee, told the Senate.

"But if he fails to sign it, the bill in my opinion will become law, notwithstanding his veto."

After a day's rambling debate, carrying the measure no nearer a vote, leaders virtually assured a speedy ballot by a unanimous consent agreement restricting talk on the bill itself, and all amendments.

Intimations of bond market uncertainty by Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, and hitherto undisclosed testimony by Director of the Budget Daniel Bell that immediate passage would cause some "shock" to the bond market, and have a "depressing effect" on Government bonds, failed to slow down the rush toward passage.

First effort to amend the bill will be met when Senator Elmer Thomas (Democrat), of Oklahoma, calls up his plan to pay the bonus in new money issued against free gold and silver in the Treasury. A currency expansionist himself, Thomas charged that the coalition bond-payment plan "out-Patmans" the inflationary Patman bill which the President vetoed last session. He said veterans must protect themselves against "bond-inflation" under the pending measure.

Senator Harrison, earlier in the debate, admitted that the coalition measure is "indirectly" inflationary.

"If $2,000,000,000 of the bonds shall be cashed in, or if $1,000,000,000 or $500,000,000 of the bonds shall be cashed in, to that extent, of course, it is inflationary," he said. "Every time there is spending of money it has a tendency toward inflation."

Veterans Administrator Frank T. Hines had testified before the Finance Committee that $1,500,000,000 of the bonds might be cashed immediately.

Denies White House Aid.

Although previously denying that the White House had any hand in drafting the coalition measure, Harrison told the Senate yesterday that "the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Robinson (majority leader), and I have tramped our way to the White House and into the offices of my colleagues here in order that we might adjust differences on this question and get it behind us."

Pressing Harrison on that point, Senator James Couzens (Republican), Michigan, who voted against the measure in committee, observed:

"Evidently the Senators went to the White House in order to get the President's approval of the bill. I do not ask the Senator to commit himself as to whether he did get the President's approval."

"I stated," Harrison retorted, "that I did not know whether the President would approve or disapprove it."

"Cannot Sign Bill."

"I say, the Senators made every effort to get his approval," Couzens continued. "Of course, in view of the President's statement before the meeting of the joint houses of Congress, when he said 'We will not retreat,' and the statement I heard him make over the radio at the Jackson Day dinner, that 'We will not retreat,' it seems to me that, taking the President's pronouncements in good faith, he cannot retreat on this bonus question and sign the bill."

"The President, in my opinion, has made no statement to anyone about it, but I know that there is a great difference between the bill now being considered by this body and the one that went to the President last time, and which he vetoed," the Mississippi Senator said.

"I say to the Senators that in my opinion, whether or not the bill shall be signed by the President, it will become law, because it is the best possible way for us to get out of the situation."

Harrison declared he had not previously believed that the bonus certificates "should be paid until the time when they were due; but a great majority of people, in my opinion—whether it is because of propaganda or change of opinion—in some other way—now believe the matter should be gotten out of the way."

Couzens contended that in prepaying the bonus, with provision for cancellation of loan interest, and a new interest payment of 3 per cent on proposed bonus bonds, Congress was granting the veterans "additional gratuities." He asked Harrison for the difference in figures between the present-day value of the certificates, and their value at maturity, "which of course is a gratuity."

Difference Over Billion.

"It is the difference between $3,760,000,000 and $2,420,000,000," Harrison replied.

Senator Henrik Shipstead (Farmer-Labor), of Minnesota, asked if the committee had considered that "about 50 per cent of the outstanding Federal debt, short and long term securities, will be due in the next ten years. Harrison replied that they had.

When Couzens declared that the veterans themselves had agreed to accept payment in 20 years, and had so "contracted" with the Government, Senator Bennett Champ Clark (Democrat), of Missouri, hotly retorted that there never had ben a "contract;" that Congress approved the bonus on its own responsibility.

Whereas the House bill would authorize immediate payment in cash, the Senate measure would give the veterans non-negotiable bonds in multiples of $50, which they could cash immediately or hold for 3 per cent interest after June 15, 1927. All unpaid interest on veterans' bonus borrowings would be "forgiven" after September 30, 1931.

"This method will be an encouragement to the former service man to hold his bonds and to cash in only those which may be necessary for his living expenses," Harrison said. "The good wife will use her good offices in trying to influence the husband to hold back for a rainy day many of these $50 bonds in order to provide the family a sustenance."

On the Hustings

Another Treasury Head Refuses Lip Service to Unsound Theories; Coolidge Silent.

ONCE again a high-ranking Treasury official has sacrificed his position rather than go through hypocritical motions of giving lip-service to political theories and practices which down in his heart he believes unsound, if not menacing to the country and its institutions.

Alongside of former Undersecretary of the Treasury Dean Kooderham Acheson, former Director of the Budget Lewis Williams Douglas and Prof. Oliver Mitchell Wentworth Sprague, Thomas Jefferson Coolidge, the present Undersecretary of the Treasury, now takes his place. They surrendered their positions because they could not wholeheartedly support the New Deal and that also is the reason for the resignation which Mr. Coolidge submitted yesterday to President Roosevelt.

Apparently a very unhappy man for several months the shy, taciturn Coolidge finally decided that he no longer could go on asquiescing, by his presence in the Adiminstration in New Deal policies believed by him to be undermining the stability of the Nation's credit and tearing asunder the political structure which has served well this country for the last 150 years.

But why, it may properly be asked, did not the youthful Boston banker, who became Undersecretary of the Treasury on May 2, 1934, realize this many, many months ago? Mr. Cooledge declines to discuss publicly the reasons for his resignation, evidently in a desire to prevent President Roosevelt's political foes from making political capital out of his disillusionment, so the question cannot be put to him.

Yet it seems reasonable to suppose that Mr. Coolidge went along with the New Deal for 20 months in the belief that many of the things distasteful to him which the Roosevelt Administration was doing would be abandoned when the emergency had passed—that they were only temporary. Mr. Douglas remained with the Administration more than a year after the New Deal started on its spending spree. He resigned only after he became convinced that there was small prospect of curtailing expenditures.

It is further reasonable to suppose that when Mr. Coolidge accepted appointment as Undersecretary of the Treasury he expected that gradually the Federal Government would retire from competition with business, would curtail its infringement on the rights and duties of the States and that gradually expenses would be reduced until a balanced budget became a real prospect, if not an actuality.

But what does he see after 20 months of service? He finds Federal finances in a more chaotic state than on the day he stepped into the Treasury. At least the Administration then had a budget, enormous though its totals were. Today the Administration is without a budget. The document sent to Capitol Hill on January 6, purporting to be a budget, was incomplete to start with, but an hour after its submission it was meaningless.

Nor is it humanly possible at this time to forecast accurately either the deficit for the current fiscal year or for the year starting July 1. In the first place the ultimate disposition of the bonus question remains in doubt. Of course the Senate will pass the bill. But will the President veto it, and, if he does, will he make a hard, serious fight to have his veto sustained?

Assuming the passage of the bonus bill, there is no one who can predict how many of the "baby bonus bonds" will be cashed in this fiscal year and how many held by the veterans. Also making the budget a matter of guess work no one knows whether the Treasury ultimately will not be forced to give up all or a part of the $1,000,000,000 it has collected in processing taxes. No wonder that the man responsible for financing these New Deal demands declines longer to accept the responsibility.

President Roosevelt, in his budget message to Congress, declared that "it is the deficit of today which is making possible the surplus of tomorrow." Congress apparently wants that "surplus of tomorrow" to be mighty large, for it is certainly doing all it can to make the deficit of today a record breaker.

Senator Gerald P. Nye's well-laid plan to use the inquiry into the wartime activities of the Morgan banking house as a springboard for the passage of rigid neutrality legislation has become a boomerang. It is no secret that the Morgan inquiry was started for the purpose of inflaming public opinion in behalf of such legislation.

But Senator Nye overplayed his hand. All that he has done to the Morgans is to convict them of being shrewd commercial bankers. The country already knew that and consequently yawned over the proceedings. In order to get publicity for his hearings, the North Dakotan started his assault on Woodrow Wilson, and thus attracted to himself and his neutrality proposals the anwer and ire of the Senate Democrats, as well as some public revulsion.

First Fund Bill For 879 Million Voted by House

Biggest Item for Veterans Agency; $956,000 to Tariff Body.

By the Associated Press.

The session's first appropriation bill, carrying $879,743,905 for some two dozen Government establishments, was passed by the House yesterday and sent to the Senate.

The independent offices bill's biggest item was $753,727,000 for the Veterans' Administration.

A $956,000 allowance for the Tariff Commission for 1936-37 was seized upon by Republican foes of the Administration's reciprocal trade agreement policy as a vehicle for their censure.

Representative Culkin (Republican), New York, proposed to trim $178,000 from the commission's allocation. Representative Taber (Republican), New York, followed up the 67-to-100 defeat of Culkin's amendment with a proposal to strike out the entire tariff commission appropriation, declaring there was no use appropriating any more money for it. Taber's amendment went down on a scattered voice vote. The measure was sent to the Senate without a record vote.

Unchanged from the form in which it came from the Appropriations Committee, the independent offices bill called for new appropriations totaling $47,601,861 less than budget estimates, but $74,509,747 higher than the current year's appropriation. This increase represented mainly added activities, such as the utilities control and motor vehicle acts.

The actual funds available to some two dozen agencies lumped under the single bill would be well above the $900,000,000 mark, however, because the committee substituted for cuts reappropriations from unused funds.

The Veterans' Administration, drawing $753,727,000 under the bill, received by far the largest portion of the total.

Hoover Will Talk On 'State of Union'

Lincoln, Nebr., Jan. 17 (AP).—Apparently fully recovered from a throat ailment that bothered him yesterday, former President Herbert Hoover, announced today he would speak next on "The State of the Union,"—the title of President Roosevelt's recent message to Congress. It will be delivered at Portland, Oreg., February 1.

Mr. Hoover smiled as he uttered the words "The state of the Union." It was this speech by Mr. Roosevelt that Mr. Hoover recently said might have been entitled "War On Earth and Ill Will Among Men."

Mussoloni 'Receptive' To New Peace Plans

Geneva, Jan. 17 (AP).—Unofficial Italian sources said tonight Premier Mussolini would be "receptive" to any new peace proposal.

These sources suggested that the chairman of the League Council visit Rome in an attempt to establish bases for new peace suggestions. They predicted that a proposal for an oil boycott against Italy would be buried by the Council.

message said, "Ship's party returned with Ellsworth January 16."

The rescue was described more fully in this message:

"On first arrival in the Bay of Whales, an orange-colored cloth with a tent was observed on the barrier face.

"A rocket fired from the ship was not answered. A moth (airplane) flew to Little America, 5 miles distant. Kenyon emerged. A food parachute was dropped with letters.

"Kenyon advanced and met the ship's party. He was received on board at 12:55 a. m. January 16. He reported Ellsworth alive, but suffering from a slight cold.

"The ship's party is advancing to meet Ellsworth. (A subsequent message disclosed the explorer was taken aboard.)

"The American airmen state they ran out of fuel 20 miles from Little America, on a bearing of 165 degrees, and sledged in.

"Kenyon is very fit.

"A transmitter switch caused the radio failure."

Hopes for the safety of the men had been revived yesterday with a brief message from the Discovery that an unidentified airplane and man had been sighted by it.

Wife Receives News.

Commander Hill was sent messages of congratulation by Premier Lyons of Australia and other high officials for his success in maneuvering through the ice floes and his fast time in reaching the Bay of Whales, where the ship forced its way through ice. The Discovery II sailed from Dunedin January 2.

Hollick-Kenyon's wife in Ewings Landing, British Columbia, walked a mile over the snow to receive by telephone the news of her husband's safety.

"I felt they would get through. I haven't worried more than I could help," she said. "I never lost confidence he would be found alive. "They"—the two children—"will be overjoyed. I must rush home to tell them."

Relatives of Hollick-Kenyon, a native of England, had lost hope. Mrs. H. V. Kenyon, his aunt, said, "We thought six weeks was the limit. We had no news and feared the worst.

Relief Strikers Firm in Stand Against Wages

Arrest of Leader, Tear Gas Fail to Halt Courthouse Demonstration.

By the Associated Press.

Fort Scott, Kans., Jan. 17.—The arrest of their leader, a tear gas barrage and threatened troop action failed tonight to dislodge a handful of relief workers entrenched in the Bourbon County Courthouse since Tuesday protesting relief wages.

Temporarily routed by tear gas last night, 30 of the original 100 demonstrators returned to roam the courthouse corridors today.

As the remaining demonstrators prepared to "dig in for a real struggle," county officials announced the courthouse would be "fumigated" again—a nightly practice which began Wednesday after one of the protestants became ill of diphtheria.

A controversy over relief allotments, based on a charge the county is being deprived of its WPA apportionment, was waged over the heads of the idle workers. The group began its courthouse vigil in protest against pay of $1 a day ordered on a county project. The workers demand 30 cents an hour.

Bourbon County commissioners telegraphed State WPA Administrator Evan Griffith at Topeka, asserting the "disgraceful and deplorable demonstrations staged by the unemployed in this city * * * are directly caused by your failure to provide jobs for these people."

At Topeka, John Brink, Griffith's deputy, replied that "Bourbon County has received its proportionate share of WPA jobs."

Brink said a request to increase Kansas's WPA quota from 41,200 to 47,200 would be made of Harry Hopkins, WPA administrator.

Antarctic Bay, Rescue's Scene, Pictured Here

Geographic Society Group 'Sees' Place Ellsworth Was Marooned.

The great pressure ridges, formed by buckling ice, a bleak wilderness of ice hummocks and crevasses and the chill waters of the Bay of Whales, where Ellsworth and his companion, Herbert Hollick-Kenyon, spent the last two months awaiting rescue were shown in Dr. Paulter's pictures. Taken in the vicinity of Little America, headquarters of the Byrd Expedition, a year ago, they furnished an excellent picture of conditions the marooned flyers faced after their 2,000-mile hop across Antarctico from the Weddell Sea.

Dr. Poulter described the vigil kept by Admiral Byrd during the long Antarctic night on the last Byrd Expedition, at an outpost 123 miles inland, where weather conditions uninfluenced by the ocean could be studied.

Dr. Poulter showed motion pictures of life in Little America, with the unloading and transporting 600 tons of supplies, watching movies and studying in the long evenings whe nthe sun had disappeared, attending classes in science, working in the machine shop, competing in chess and archery contests, and celebrating the middle of the four-and-one-half-month night with a banquet.

Commercial Airlines To Aid in Next War

Albuquerque, N. Mex., Jan 17 (AP). Col. Edgar S. Gorrell, new "Czar" of United States Airlines, said today "I believe there will be a major European war in two to five years and I want our commercial air lines to be able to aid in defense should the United States be attacked."

In an interview here on his way to Los Angeles, he said his position under the newly formed Air Transportation Association of America was as arbiter, maintaining harmony among the 28 member lines.

Battleships

still negotiating. But if there is none, we should modernize our battleships and replace those which are obsolete, over a period of years. One or two should be taken care of at once."

In other quarters it was said that due to the treaty ban on replacements, Japan, for example, although inferior to the United States in capital ship tonnage, would be superior to the United States in the up-to-date character of her battleship strength.

Efforts by the Navy to provide for replacement of the Arkansas, overage since 1932, were made during the Treasury's budget hearings, but no provision was made in the estimates. Fresh requests may be carried to Congress for at least one battleship replacement, and modernization of two others, probably the New York and the Texas, in addition to the regular treaty building program.

The Arkansas, in 1932, and the New York and the Texas in 1934, all passed their allotted 20 years. Battleships becoming over-age within the next year include the Arizona, the Nevada, the Oklahoma and the Pennsylvania.

Only Five Not Modernized.

Replacement of a single battleship would cost in the neighborhood of $50,000,000, while modernization costs range from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. All but five of the United States' 15 battleships have been modernized.

New money and unexpended balances made available in the President's budget provide $243,000,000 for 12 new destroyers and 6 submarines in the next fiscal year, the remainder going for completion of 94 vessels now under construction.

Declaring that as a member of the Navy Appropriations sub-committee, he will press for maintenance of treaty limits, McLeod, in a statement last night, said it was "unfortunate" the United States had not kept pace with the other powers in this respect.

"It devolves upon the United States to make clear to the world its attitude in regard to naval armaments and their relation to peace among the nations," he said.

"We seek, and have always sought, international amity. I am convinced that friendship among nations can best be maintained by mutual respect. Such respect cannot be maintained unless we, as a Nation, are prepared to combat those who would wilfully and maliciously destroy the tenets of liberty to which we have throughout our national life adhered."

Fighting Fish

tele at the arena, the Police Department had been notified.

"I feel," he said yesterday, "like a balloon that has bumped into the business end of a hatpin."

"You see," he explained patiently, "there's nothing cruel or inhumane about this thing. Betta splendens (that's the icthyologist's name for the battlers) really love to fight. And they don't have it out to the finish. Oh, no! Those fellows are sportsmen.

"First of all, they have no feeling; so they can feel no pain. Placed in the same tank, they come out of their corners slowly, like boxers, and spar for an opening. They go for the opponent's pectoral fin because when that is crippled the fish is hors de combat.

"Does the other then proceed to kill the losers? He does not. Didn't I say these Siamese are sportsmen. The winner goes to a neutral corner (Orsinger did not explain which is the neutral corner in a round tank) and that's all there is."

In a couple of weeks the damaged fin, or any other injured part of the anatomy, has repaired itself and the loser is not only as good as new, but looking around for the resin box, Orsinger said.

"A fish fight"—the director's tone was sad, indeed, by now—"such as this was to have been would have helped get the public's mind off such worries as the bonus and balanced budgets. Just like 'The Music Goes 'Round and 'Round.'"

He intimated that an attempt might be made to have the duel staged in New York's famous Battery Park Aquarium, with possibly a "Fight Special" train being chartered to carry fans from Washington.

Morgans Deny Nye's Charges Of Advance Tip

Wire Senator They Had No Knowledge of Connally and Pope Speeches.

Special Dispatch to The Post.

New York, Jan. 17.—J. P. Morgan & Co. tonight made public telegraphic correspondence between the company and Senator Gerald P. Nye, in which members of the Morgan firm denied Nye's statement that they had advance knowledge of "embarrassing statements" that were to be made on the Senate floor about the work of Nye's munitions committee.

The Morgan firm wired Senator Nye:

"The news ticker quotes you as saying on the Senate floor today that members of J. P. Morgan & Co., present at the Senate munitions hearing passed around notes among themselves announcing 'that embarrassing statements would be made on the Senate floor about the work of the Senate committee.'

"If you have been correctly reported we beg to inform you that the statement is wholly untrue and we shall appreciate your making a correction of it.

"None of us had information of any kind as to Senator Connally's intention until advised through members of the press that he was already making the speech later reported."

The following reply was received from Senator Nye:

"Glad to make correction if you will say you had no knowledge of Senator Pope's plans as well."

To this the Morgan company replied:

"In reply to our telegram to you of this afternoon in which we denied the incorrect statement made by you about us on the Senate floor this morning we have your response, reading as follows:

"'Glad to make correction if you will say you had no knowledge of Senator Pope's plans as well.'

"It is incomprehensible to us why you should make your correction of a misstatement about us conditional upon something else. But for your information we had not the slightest previous knowledge of Senator Pope's action and his appearance was a complete surprise to us."

closing past, present or future war plans.

They also were forbidden to give out estimates of stocks of munitions on hand.

Italy, informed circles said today, has decided to attend a session of the League Council at Geneva Monday, when the question of an oil boycott may come up.

Baron Pompeo Aloisi, deegate to the League, is expected to leave tomorrow and to play a "normal role" while there.

The Fascist government sent a lengthy protest to the League against what it called Ethiopian atrocities, including the mutilation of Italians taken prisoner and even the dead on the battlefield.

Text of Glass Speech Denouncing Nye for Wilson Attack

Following is the text of the speech made in the Senate yesterday by Senator Carter Glass (Democrat), Virginia, in defense of the memory of Woodrow Wilson:

Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I venture to trespass upon the time of the Senate today, particularly in view of the fact that the real issue before this body is one of so great importance as to closely affect the interests of millions of our fellow-citizens. It occurred to me, and the thought was confirmed by suggestions from my colleagues, that as a more or less intimate friend of the late Woodrow Wilson, as a former member of his official family, it would be pertinent if I should briefly respond to the shocking assault made upon his character and the attempted impeachment of his integrity and his veracity. This I shall do in unmistakable terms and, but for the limitations of the rules of the Senate, in phraseology which I am not accustomed to use.

If it were permissible in the Senate to say that any man who would asperse the integrity and veracity of Woodrow Wilson is a coward, if it were permissible to say that his charge is not only malicious, but positively mendacious, that I would be glad to say here, and elsewhere, to any man whether he be a United States Senator or not—because the charge would be not only destitute of decency, but it would be such a shocking exhibition as never has happened in the 35 years I have served in the Congress of the United States. In that period no President of the United States, however bitter his adversaries, however uncompromising in their antagonism, has ever been charged on the floor of the Senate with having deliberately falsified in a matter of importance.

Questions Nye's Intimacy.

When the question is reduced to its last analysis, what do we find as the basis of the charge? When, may I ask, was the Senator of North Dakota transferred from the room which the Senator from Texas (Mr. Connally) gave to him, to the British Embassy? When did his intimacy with Mr. Balfour become so great as to warrant him in standing here and saying, because Mr. Balfour thought he said something to President Woodrow Wilson, therefore his thought, his supposition, is to be taken as a verity and Woodrow Wilson charged with falsification? Why, I would accept the word of Woodrow Wilson rather than that of Balfour and of Seymour and of the Senator from North Dakota put together.

What a subtle and mean attempt to have it appear that Woodrow Wilson was compelled by the House of Morgan to drag this Nation into the World War and to sacrifice the lives of our boys. No one ever associated with Woodrow Wilson, no one who ever had any access to the man's thoughts, would ever have the audacity to suggest that his sympathies were with the great banking interests of this country and that he took us into the war to save the paltry dollars of the Wall Street interests. And yet, Mr. President, those who have noted the newspaper accounts of this investigation have seen question after question asked, the plain implication of which was that the House of Morgan influenced Woodrow Wilson to alter his policy of neutrality and to precipitate this country into war.

I resent it, as every American citizen who knew Woodrow Wilson would resent it, as an infamous libel, whether suggested or directly made. Woodrow Wilson did not declare war. The Constitution confines that business exclusively to the Congress of the United States. The President came before the Congress and stated his reasons why there should be a declaration, and the Congress responded and the country responded with applause and appreciation of the manhood of their President. That approval and that applause was different from the applause that greeted the sinking of the Lusitania; and it would be appropriate for the Senator from North Dakota to offer for consideration of the Senate a resolution of apology to Germany for our declaration of war.

Defends Bankers' Loans.

From time to time it has been suggested in the newspapers that members of this committee were going to present to the country shocking revelations. It remained until day before yesterday to present anything of a shocking nature; and that was the unspeakable accusation against a dead President, dirt-daubing the sepulchre of Woodrow Wilson.

What has been presented, what of an imperative nature has been disclosed, was not already known; what that is relevant to this discussion? Every intelligent American citizen knew that the banking interests of this country were loaning large sums of money to the Allies; and why not? We were selling the warring nations our cotton. We were selling them our wheat. We were selling them our produce of every description, both the Allies and the central powers, so far as delivery could be made. Why should we not have sold them our credit? It was not a war of our making. For three years it was their war. Why should we have shut down our industries? Why should we have refused the producing farmers of this country the right to sell the products of their farms? And why should we have prevented, if we could have prevented, the banking interests from selling their credit abroad?

Everybody who came in contact with the then President of the United States knows perfectly well that he wanted to be neutral. To some of us he was vastly too neutral, and was bitterly assailed by men of the type of Theodore Roosevelt and others for not taking this country into war two years before we entered the war. There were millions of American citizens with boys whose lives would be risked who felt the same way about it. But there were secret treaties; and what relationship that has to this matter is beyond me to determine. What has that to do now with the sale and manufacture and export of munitions?

Suppose there were secret treaties—and there were—were we to sit idly by and permit German submarines to sink our merchant vessels and other vessels on which our nationals traveled on the high seas? Whether Wilson knew or did not know—and he did not know—of these secret treaties, was that a justification for brigandage on the high seas? Should we have made a condition of our entrance into the war that the European nations should abrogate all secret treaties, whether or not we knew of them?

Says U. S. Urges Loan.

Why, everybody knows, except the Senator from North Dakota, that Woodrow Wilson came near wrecking his life at Versailles in his protestations against carrying out terms of certain secret treaties; but, after all, what has that to do with this question? What has that to do with legislation designed to keep this country out of useless war? What has that to do with the manufacture and exportation of munitions of war?

You let the United States of America segregate itself in all of its trade relations whenever war shall occur and you literally wreck the economic status of this country.

Think of it! Some great European nation or nations manufacturing munitions, and exporting their products to the belligerents of Europe or Asia, and the United States isolating itself, pretending to be purer and more humane than any other nation, and denying the right of its own nationals to produce and to sell!

It has been asserted here that the Government had an unrestricted right to permit the banking interests of this country to sell their credit abroad during the early stages of the World War. I have not had the time to examine the statutes on the subject, but to me it seems an incredible assertion. As a matter of practice, the Government of the United States never has done that, so far as I know; quite the contrary. In the post-war period, under the three Administrations succeeding that of Woodrow Wilson, they not only permitted but encouraged the sale of private credits to the enormous extent of $12,000,000,000 in South America alone, and practically put the indorsement of the State Department upon every one of these transactions; and yet now the country is to be shocked with the revelation that Mr. Wilson did not put a stop to the sale of private credits to belligerent nations abroad, and, worse than that, as I have indicated, questions propounded to witnesses before this committee carried the plain implication that the interrogators believed that Woodrow Wilson was prevailed upon to take his Nation into war in order to secure the loans of these private banks!

Says Wilson Was Impatient.

Oh, the miserable demagogy, the miserable and mendacious suggestion, that the House of Morgan altered the neutrality course of Woodrow Wilson!

As a matter of fact, the President was appealed to by some influential people to declare war against Great Britain for intercepting and injuring our trade relations. As a matter of fact everybody intimate with Mr. Wilson knows that he was excessively impatient with Ambassador Page because of the ambassador's frequent and incessant partiality for Great Britain. And when an extract is read here from some letter from Ambassador Page in confirmation of the miserable charge that Woodrow Wilson is a liar, I begin to wonder if that was one of the letters from Ambassador Page which Mr. Wilson did not read at all. And when extracts are read here from Prof. Seymour, who is a romanticist, to insist that Wilson knew what Wilson said he did not know, and serious United States Senators are asked to take that testimony as a confirmation of the outrageous assault upon the integrity and veracity of a dead President of the United States, that is the most shocking thing that has emanated from this committee.

Mr. President, I admit with some degree, if not of shame, of intense regret, that as a member of the Committe on Appropriation of the Senate, and as its chairman, I voted funds for this exploitation. I will never vote another dollar to anybod/ or to any committee any one of whose members is so insensible to every consideration of decency as to stand on the Senate floor and bitterly assail two dead men who are honored by this entire Nation. Not another dollar will I vote to that committee.

Calls Funds Wasted.

It may be pardoned to its members to think and to say that they regard their work as of inestimable value. So far as I have been able to appreciate it, I think it is $125,000 of the Senate's funds wasted and given over by at least one member of that committee to the exploitation of himself, to a desperate and constant effort to figure on the front pages of sensational newspapers; but even the sensational papers are tired of it.

Then, in the desperate moments to be figured, he asperses the character and veracity of Woodrow Wilson, and alleges in evidence that Lord Balfour and Prof. Seymour and Col. House and Lloyd George surmised that Mr. Wilson knew what Mr. Wilson said he did not know.

Oh, I need not take the time of the Senate, or of any group of decent citizens in the United States, to insist that Woodrow Wilson was a great patriot, and that his soul shrank from war, and that for a long period of time he was in grave doubt as to which of the belligerents merited greater criticism, profounder sympathy, from the American people.

But the Senator from North Dakota has discovered, because, forsooth, there were secret treaties abroad, that Mr. Wilson was rushed into the war to save the credits of the House of Morgan. Did ever argument descend to that depth before in the history of the United States Senate?

Now, Mr. President, lest I should infringe those rules which I always obey, perhaps I would better desist, because what I feel like saying here or anywhere else to the man who thus insults the memory of Woodrow Wilson is something which may not be spoken here, or printed in the newspapers, or uttered by a gentleman.

United League Action Sought By Capt. Eden

Copyright, 1936, by the United Press.

Warwick, England, Jan. 17.—A strong stand for peace through collective international action was urged tonight by Capt. Anthony Eden, forceful young statesman, in his maiden speech as British foreign secretary. He referred to the League of Nations session convening in Geneva Monday, at which the Italo-Ethiopian crisis will be the principal concern.

"Let there be no faint hearts but let there be realism," he told listeners in the home constituency of Warwick.

"We must all try to look beyond the immediate conflict with which the League is confronted and keep a firm hold on a few simple essentials. I suggest, firstly: Aggression ought not to be allowed to succeed; secondly: members of the League should be so strong, so united, that they can bring home to any aggressor now and in the future that peaceful negotiation is not merely the best but is the most successful way of removing discontents."

Eden, however, avoided direct reference to possible oil sanctions against Italy, aggressor in the East African war now raging.

The foreign secretary pleaded for close understanding with nations not members of the League, particularly the United States.

"You may be sure that we will take every opportunity of strengthening the bonds of friendship and understanding with the United States," he said.

3 British Battalions Go to African Base

London, Jan. 17 (AP).—Three battalions of British troops, numbering between 2,000 and 3,000, arrived at Alexandria, Egypt, yesterday, and were reported without confirmation today to be en route to the strategic Mersamatruh base.

Officials declined to disclose the object of the movement, but rumors circulated of fears of an attack from Italy's North African possession of Libya, because of application of sanctions.

Felix H. Knight Elected To A. F. L. Council

Miami, Fla., Jan. 17 (AP).—Felix H. Knight, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, was elected to the American Federation of Labor's executive council today to succeed John L. Lewis, miner's leader, who resigned last November.

Announcing Knight's election, the federation's president, William Green, with whom Lewis often differed, revealed he personally intervened, prior to the last elections, to save Lewis from defeat. He told newspapermen:

Crew of Italian Plane Is Interned by Britain

London, Jan. 17 (AP).—The foreign office announced today that the captain and crew of three of an Italian warplane which made a forced landing Wednesday 50 miles inside the Sudan frontier in East Africa had been interned under neutrality regulations promulgated last October.

The Italian government has been notified, it was said.

The plane landed at Debet Awatak.

Sea Yields 7 Bodies.

North Cove, Wash., Jan. 17 (AP).—The sea surrendered today the seventh body of the 34 victims of the Iowa disaster on Peacock Spit in the Columbia River Sunday. It was not immediately identified.

Navy Secrecy May Be Ended By Four Powers

By the Associated Press.

London, Jan. 17.—Four large naval powers made rapid progress toward an agreement today on a plan for advance notification of annual building programs and exchange of construction information.

A technical sub-committee was appointed by Great Britain, France, Italy and the United States to work out details of the plan and to compromise the slight differences between suggestions by Britain, France and Italy.

There was no response from the Japanese delegation, which withdrew from the conference two days ago, to a letter asking if Tokyo wanted to appoint observers.

The sub-committee began work immediately and expected to report next week. The conference adjourned until Tuesday, when it will take up an effort to limit the tonnage and gun calibers of all types of warships—but in any agreement an "escape clause" will be inserted because of uncertainty as to what Japan will do.

The sub-committee is considering whether the exchange of information should be preceded or followed by a consultation of powers, whether the announcements should be made simultaneously, or whether, once made, they can not be modified.

Adoption of the plan would eliminate secrecy from building and go far, in the opinion of delegates, to maintain confidence. Each power would keep the other fully advised as to what she is doing every year.

Planes, Troops Aid Hunt for Lost Boy

Bisbee, Ariz., Jan 17 (AP).—Three Army pursuit planes, 100 soldiers and more than 100 law enforcement officers and ranchers were poured into a search today for a 5-year-old boy in the Gaudulupe Mountains along the Mexican border.

The soldiers were sent from Fort Huachuca today.

At March Field, Calif., three airmen volunteered to join in the search and took off this afternoon for Bisbee.

They were Kermit Harcos, of Los Angeles, Second Lieuts. John H. Turner, of Corning, Iowa, and William M. Brown, of Long Beach.

Glass Assails Nye for 'Slur'

"Mr. President, I admit with some degree, if not of shame, of intense regret, that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and as its chairman, I voted funds for this exploitation. I will never vote another dollar to anybody or to any committee, any one of whose members is so insensible to every consideration of decency as to stand on the Senate floor and bitterly assail two dead men who are honored by this entire Nation. Not another dollar will I vote to that committee."

There was applause from Democratic Senators as the speaker concluded with these words:

"Now, Mr. President, lest I should infringe those rules which I always obey, perhaps I would better desist, because what I feel like saying here or anywhere else to the man who thus insults the memory of Woodrow Wilson is something which may not be spoken here, or printed in the newspapers, or uttered by a gentleman."

Hand Is Bandaged.

To Senators who rushed to congratulate him, Glass smilingly held out his bloody right hand. Then he left the chamber, returning a few minutes later with his hand bandaged.

Senator Byrnes startled the Senate a few minutes later with the assertion that, in addition to its $125,000 appropriation, the Munitions Committee had spent $23,000 of the funds of the State and City of New York. Nye had previously said that his committee had spent $58,000 to pay relief workers to assist it in compiling records. Of this amount the Government had contributed $35,000 and the city and State the remainder.

Senator Robinson, his face red, took the floor.

"The Senate has been put in the attitude of going on relief," he said. "Has it come to the place where the committee would disgrace the Senate by such action? The Senate has made large appropriations for the committee. Relief funds are to feed the hungry."

Nye protested that other committees and Government organizations had used relief workers.

Adds to Humiliation.

"That only adds to the humiliation and disgrace of the Senate," Robinson protested. "I think the Senate ought to express not its disapproval, but its condemnation of such a practice.

"We may be hard up, but, thank God, I don't think we have come to that pass."

Byrnes, chairman of the committee on audit and control, said he had never before heard of such action by a committee and that he was taking steps to learn if this was true.

Opening the discussion and replying to remarks of Senator Connally (Democrat), of Texas, made Thursday, Nye said that he was surprised there had not been "an earlier concentrated effort" to stop the committee's work. He said hostile feelings began to be evident as soon as the committee began examining partners of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Nye told of the withdrawal from participation in the hearing of Senator George (Democrat), Georgia, and Pope (Democrat), of Idaho. He said when word that they would withdraw was spread the Morgan partners, on the witness stand, passed notes among themselves.

Witnesses Smiled Smugly.

"I wish members of the Senate could have seen the smug smiles of satisfaction on the faces of the witnesses," he said.

"I have no apologies to offer for any comment I have made or for any course that has been pursued by myself or the committee," he continued.

In New York last night the Morgan company made public a telegram it had sent to Senator Nye denying Nye's charge that members of the company had advance knowledge of Senator Connally's attack on the committee chairman and calling for a correction from Nye. The North Dakota Senator replied that he would make the correction if the Morgan partners would say they had had no knowledge of Senator Pope's plan to withdraw, with Senator George, from the hearing. To this the Morgan companw replied that "we had not the slightest previous knowledge of Senator Pope's action, and his appearance was a complete surprise to us."

Nye in his speech denied a published report that he had said Wilson and Lansing "lied." Then he read the record in which he had said they "falsified."

The Senator then read letters and documents to prove his point.

"The United States entered the war," he said, "knowing the spoils had been agreed upon. Yet we were told news of secret treaties came as a bombshell at the peace conference."

Record Clear, Nye Says.

He passed among the Senators a document, which he said added strength to his contention, but which he said the State Department had declined to publish. Connally read the paper carefully. Nye said it revealed that secret treaties were on file at the State Department when this country entered the war.

"The record is undeniably clear that there was knowledge of these secret treaties long before our delegates arrived in Versailles," he said.

"Does the Senator now repeat that Wilson and Lansing falsified?" Connally asked.

"I do," Nye replied firmly.

He then quoted from proceedings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of 1919 in which Wilson and Lansing denied knowledge of the treaties.

"I have no apologies to offer," he said. "I recall no word of my statement that Wilson and Lansing falsified in testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee in 1919."

Nye said he expected to continue the hearings for 15 days, starting next Thursday, when the Morgan partners will appear. He said he intended asking the Senate for $7,000 or $9,000. The $125,000 appropriation has been spent.

Wilson Defended.

Feeling among many Senators was that the work of the Munitions Committee had been ended by the storm of opposition. It appeared doubtful whether the committee could obtain a new appropriation and that it could go ahead without it.

Both Secretary of State Hull and Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson, later in the day, defended President Wilson.

Secretary Hull told newsmen:

"I served in an official capacity during Mr. Wilson's Administration and I have the highest regard for his patroitism and scrupulous honesty."

Tumulty, in a statement, asserted:

"With charity toward the accusers as well as the accused, it it not easy for me, as one who stood by the side of Woodrow Wilson for over 13 years to accept as truth the charges and insinuations contained in the headlines of the newspapers reflecting upon the patriotism and high purposes of Woodrow Wilson. His high sense of integrity would not permit him to be the cats-paw of any interest.

"Like Lincoln, he hesitated and changed his views, his critics forgetting that the things of life with which statesmen deal are not static, but dynamic and moving, changing with each passing day. Sometimes he threw prudence to the winds and sought by audicity to blaze his way through the wilderness of doubt to the great goal he sought to attain."

By the Associated Press.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee was said authoritatively to have reached virtual agreement yesterday on all major provisions of the Administration neutrality bill except that authorizing discretionary embargoes on shipments of war materials to belligerents.

Because serious differences of opinion foreshadowed a major battle over the war materials section, the committee skipped over it yesterday to iron out minor disagreements over other provisions.

In addition to the discretionary embargoes on commodities and articles that might be used for war purposes, the bill would place mandatory embargoes on actual war implements and restrict credits to belligerents.

Some committee members said it might be Tuesday or Wednesday before the bill would be approved, and perhaps the following week before it could be brought onto the House floor.

Rise of Kipling To World Fame Swift, Stormy

Bard of the East, Famous at 26, Caused Furore in Literary Circles.

By Osgood Nichols.

To the English-speaking peoples of the world, Rudyard Kipling, will always be the swashbuckling bard who came out of the East 45 years ago with the British Empire "rattling like lose change in his trouser pocket" and tok the world by a storm unprecedented in the history of letters.

To them there is no connection between that Kipling and the old-fashioned recluse who had lived behind the high walls and moat of his estate in Sussex since the turn of the century.

The world had passed him by. Gone were the days of empire-building of which he had been the trumpeter. They had been given an immortality in his books, far more permanent than that written in the pages of history.

Unlike most authors, who have to await death for recognition, Kipling was a world figure at 26. Ironically, it was that very fame which drove him into seclusion and away from the color and throb of life which had been his food and drink.

Hero-worshippers and autograph-hunters had hounded him from Vermont to Africa. Finally, in desperation the author of "Kim" and "Soldiers Three" turned his back in 1897 on a world which was buying his books at the rate of 300,000 a year, paying $100,000 for a collection of his first editions.

Called a Jingo.

Kipling entered the hearts of the people despite the almost unanimous opposition of the critics who called him a jingoistic hack journalist. Then he was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1907, the first Englishman to be accorded this honor, the blue stockings gasped in horror.

However, he was the man of the hour. Nothing could impede the rise of the man who came to England from India to blast fresh air into the parlors of staid Victorians.

His countrymen welcomed him and old and young were soon repeating with gusto such phrases as "you're a pore benighted heathen but a first-class fightin' man." He may have been vulgar, but they liked him.

Never Laureate.

And yet this man who came to be looked upon as the symbol of the British Empire never received the highest literary honor of his land—the poet laureateship. Many have been the speculations as to the reason for this omission. Most persistent is that he insulted Queen Victoria in one of his "Barrack Room Ballads."

This unfortunate verse described the Widow of Windsor as sending her soldiers to "barbarous wars" and said, in part:

"'Ave you 'eard o' the Widow at Windsor
With a hairy gold crown on 'er head?
She 'as ships on the foam—she 'as millions at 'ome,
An' she pays us poor beggars in red!
(Ow, poor beggars in red!)

Kipling was born in Bombay, India, December 30, 1865, the son of John Lockwood Kipling, newly appointed professor of architectural sculpture in the British School of Art there, and of Alice Macdonald Kipling, one of four brilliant daughters of a Wesleyan clergyman.

At six was sent home to school in Portsmouth, England, and attended Westward Ho College on the Devon coast. It was his experience in his five years at the latter that were to become the rollicking adventures of "Stalky & Co." In this he is easily recognized as "Beetle," so dubbed because of his short-sightedness which persisted despite double-lensed glasses.

Editor Called Grim.

Graduating at 17, he was faced with the alternatives of the university or the Orient. He chose the latter and embarked on a career of journalism at Lahore, India, in 1882 as a cub on the Civil and Military Gazette.

His managing editor, a grim, dyspeptic fellow, took a liking to this imaginative youngster and squeezed out enough space for small and gay verses written at odd moments and signed "R. K." The public liked these space-fillers and urged the lad to publish them in book form.

Undaunted by a lack of funds, he employed a native printer to work off hours and set up his verses on galley sheets. He bound these in an oblong wire-stitched docket done in imitation of an official government brown paper envelope and entitled "Department Ditties."

Their success was phenomenal. He peddled them by reply post cards up and down British Asia from Aden to Singapore. Cash came with the orders and the edition was sold out in a few weeks. Recalling this in later life caused the author to remark, "that recollection has since prevented me from injuring my health by sympathizing with publishers who talk of their risks." He was to become one of the hardest bargain-drivers the publishers had ever seen.

Five years passed, the young journalist transferred to the Allahabad Pioneer and published in quick succession "Plain Tales From the Hills," "Soldiers Three," "The Gadsbys," "In Black and White," "Under the Deodars," "The Phantom Rickshaw" and "Wee Willie Winkle."

U. S. Reception Cool.

Restless, after eight years in the Orient, he suddenly sold his copyright of six stories, embarked for England via the United States with $1,250 in his pocket. But his reception in America was not what this optimistic youth had expected.

Hard-boiled newspaper editors and book publishers had never heard the magic name of Kipling. All they saw was a shy, ungainly, near-sighted youth. So he was buffeted from door to door, and finally sailed, disillusioned, for England. This gruesome period he later wove into "The Light That Failed."

London and a garret, then three stories that sold for $15. They were to be his making, for on the strength of them he persuaded MacMillan to publish an edition of "Plain Tales."

He became an overnight sensation. Acclamations broke about his ears and he unloaded a trunkful of manuscripts on the British public, hungry for his racy prose after the dreariness of Thackeray, Jane Austen and Thomas Hardy.

Fortune came with fame. S. S. McClure, the American publisher, paid him $25,000 for the serial rights to "Kim." Kipling used this money to travel, and in 1892 visited Ceylon, Australia and the United States.

It was on this return visit to this country that the author met and fell in love with Caroline, sister of his American friend and London garret companion, Wolcott Balestier. After marriage in New York and a honeymoon in Japan, the couple returned to these shores and attempted to settle down on Mrs. Kipling's family estate at Battleboro, Vt., in 1893.

It seemed for a while that this famous Britisher might settle on these shores forever. During the next four years he turned out a score of volumes, including "Captains Courageous," "The Seven Seas," the two "Jungle Books" and the "Just So Stories."

But something never fully explained happened at Naulahka, his Vermont home. Hero worshiping Americans pestered him, made the place a pilgrimage, bothered him with telephone calls. And the Vermonters never understood him. At Gloucester, where he had gone to gather his material for "Captains Courageous," they laughed at him. "Kipling never understood us fisherman," they said, and those familiar with the Gloucesterman know, from reading his book, that he never did.

And so Kipling and his family fled from prying Americans to Africa, through Egypt and the Soudan, down to the Cape. That was in 1897. He planned to return to the States, but fear of a recurrence of the Vermont misadventures induced him to go to England. There he bought an old house at Rattingdean, a Sussex town near the famed resort of Brighton Beach. The public followed him there—scores of American tourists in the summer time; his own countrymen all the year around. He struggled against their importunities for two years and returned to America for a visit.

Old-time newsmen recall that visit. Kipling was stricken with pneumonia in a New York hotel, where he hovered this side of death for days. The eyes of the whole world were turned to New York; hourly the bulletins went out; never had royalty dying been closer watched than the stricken man who would never even be the official laureate of England. But Kipling recovered, even as he did, a few years ago, when he was again laid low with the same disease in his English home.

Convalesces at Sussex.

Convalescent, he returned from New York to Sussex and settled down at Batemans, a high-walled, moat-encircled estate, where there was no telephone and where the public, well-meaning though it was, could not annoy him. Here, in almost complete secrecy, he worked, saying:

I've buried my heart in a ferny hill
Oh, hop-bine yaller an' woodsmoke blue,
I reckon you'll keep her middlin' true!

I've given my soul to the South-down grass,
And sheep-bells tinkled where you pass.
Oh, Firle an' Ditchling an' sails at sea,
I reckon you'll keep my soul for me!

But it was not all sleep in the Sussex Downs. There was work, too. Practically all his later writing—his worst, said his critics—was done here, where he kept off from man and woman, averting the limelight. He worked, wanting people only to read when it was good. As he said in "Non Nobis, Domine," a poem printed last year:

And we confess our blame,
How all too high we hold
The noise which men call fame,
The dross that men call gold.

Books came from his pen, but Kipling himself seldom was seen. Like Thomas Hardy, he lived behind the hedgerows, with his words and his thoughts, apart from the world and, so many believed, no longer a part of it. His wife stayed there with him, and so did his daughter, until 1925. It was her wedding in London in that year that first drew him from his home.

Occasionally he ventured abroad, going perhaps to his favorite spa, Marienbad, in Czechoslovakia, or down to London, to attend some literary banquet. Here it was an event to see his small, bald-headed, sturdy figure, with its beetled-black brows, brown eyes twinkling behind gold rim spectacles, and square-toed boots redolent of old-fashioned shoe blacking.

But if he abjured modernity it sought him out. Six of his stories were filmed — "Kim," "Captains Courageous," "The Light That Failed," "Soldiers Three," "Toomai of the Elephants" and "His Apologies." He made marginal corrections on the scenario scripts, but he never saw the screened interpretations of the characters that had come from his fertile mind.

Still Missed Highest Honor.

All those years that he lived behind the moat, fame was his, but England's highest honor to a poet continued to pass him by. Others—like the scholarly Robert Bridges—became poet laureate, but not the man who had written:

Then 'ere's to the Widow at Windsor,
And 'ere's to the stores and the guns,
The men and 'orses what makes up the forces
O' Missis Victorier's sons!
(Poor beggars! Victorier's sons!)

Walk wide o' the Widow o' Windsor,
For 'alf o' Creation she owns;
We 'ave bought 'er the same with the sword an' the flame,
An' we've salted it down with our bones.
(Poor beggars! It's blue with our bones!)

For 20 years and more commentators blamed those verses, which appeared in "Barrack Room Ballads," for the refusal of the Crown to recognize the empire's most popular poet. As year after year passed, the legend grew that this insult to a Queen now dead rankled at the British court.

Kipling, a cousin of Stanley Baldwin, however, was presented at the King's levee in 1925 by the then prime minister and later at Balmoral, Scotland, the poet was King George's house guest, thus belying the charge of royal disfavor. Kipling himself never commented upon what others felt was a great slight.

Name That of Dialect.

A shy man, a shrewd bargainer, a born story-teller, a poet by instinct, such was the little knobbed man of Yorkshire descent whose name was of that dialect and meant: "Kip"—pointed hill; "ling"—torrent. He never minded the critics; he grew wealthy from his works; he toiled mightily always to produce the best he could. And 200,000 persons every year bought his books, so that he achieved fame greater than any other man of our time.

Oscar Wilde said once that Kipling "revealed life by flashes of vulgarity" and other critics tugged at his fame. But when he died he was still beloved and called the last of the great Victorians and probably his name meant more than that of any other author to millions of persons throughout the world.

After all, he had written "The Jungle Book," "Kim," "The Reincarnation of Krishna Mulvaney," "The Light That Failed," "The Mark of the Beast," "The Phantom Rickshaw," "Puck of Pook's Hill," "Stalky & Co.," "The Man Who Would Be King," "Soldiers Three," "Wee Willie Winkle," and "Plain Tales From the Hills"—a partial list of his achievements that generation after generation has read and loved.

Iranian Minister Departs

Underwood & Underwood.

Djalal Prepares to Sail Home As Aid Snubs Roosevelt Dinner

Sea lanes yesterday beckoned dapper, elegant Ghaffar Khan Djalal, recalled Iranian minister, and his beautiful English wife back to his native land, without so much as having sipped soup at President Roosevelt's diplomatic dinner.

The minister, still smarting from his arrest at Elkton, Md., which resulted in State Department regrets, coupled with a veiled warning against the envoys of foreign lands who abuse their diplomatic immunity, will sail aboard the French Line vessel Lafayette from Pier 57, North River, today at noon.

Meanwhile in Capital society there was much speculation as to why neither the departing envoy nor the acting charge d'affaires, M. H. Ghods, who, until Djalal's recall was merely first secretary at the Iranian Legation, had appeared at the Chief Executive's banquet.

The fact was no invitation was sent Djalal because of his recall. An invitation was sent to Ghods instead. Ghods, it was learned yesterday, declined with a brief and formal note of regret—thereby straining further the diplomatic ties between the United States and Iran, scene of many of the Thousand and One Nights.

Teherau, Iran's Capital, still is vexed at Washington, it was pointed out. In fact, no full-fledged envoy has been appointed to succeed Djalal.

Meanwhile at Elkton, Md., the man who started difficulties by slapping handcuffs on the speeding envoy last autumn, Constable Clayton Ellison, strolled the streets, still without a job, and not the least concerned with diplomatic doings nor Djalal's departure.

Efforts were made yesterday at the sumptuous Massachusetts avenue Legation of Iran to determine Ghods' whereabouts and why he did not attend the White House banquet.

"Mr. Ghods is out," a butler said. "I don't know here he has gone. "After all, I am new here. "That's all. Good day."

C. of C. Asked Stand on Relief In Montgomery

Miss Shoemaker Urges County Control in Address to Unit.

Montgomery County Bureau of The Post, 1111 Oak Ave., Silver Spring, Md. Telephone Shepherd 2383.

Miss Ruth Shoemaker, member of the Maryland House of Delegates, asked the Rockville Chamber of Commerce last night to make a recommendation as to whether it wished the county or the State to handle direct relief.

Speaking at a dinner meeting of the chamber, Miss Shoemaker said it would be more economical for Montgomery County to handle its own relief problem. In support of this, she said that, while the county pays 3.12 per cent of the gross receipts tax, total of the State, it gets back in relief money only 1.09 per cent.

The chamber named a committee to decide its wishes on the relief question.

Another speaker was Prof. Paul Walker, professor of economics at the University of Maryland. He spoke on the "Tax Problem in Maryland from a Research Standpoint."

A third speaker was J. W. Jones, president of the Montgomery County Farm Bureau.

Three hundred legionnaires who last night attended a county-wide rally at the National Guard Armory at Kensington, under auspices of the Montgomery County American Legion Council, were urged to support the universal service act, pending in Congress, which would authorize the conscription of materials and money as well as men in war time.

This was asked by Miller C. Foster, assistant to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce. Foster also stressed the need for members of the legion to support and care for disabled and needy veterans.

Other speakers included Walter E. Huff, secretary to Mayor Jackson, of Baltimore; Mayor Alfred L. Geiger, of Kensington, and Caesar Aiello, of Hyattsville, past department commander of the Maryland legion.

Judge Thomas M. Anderson, of the County Juvenile Court, has been named acting judge of Montgomery County Police Court for today by Judge Charles W. Woodward, of the County Circuit Court. Police Judge Harold C. Smith is ill.

Sheriff G. Edington Bell has declined to release from the county jail a prisoner whose term was commuted by Judge Smith. The sheriff has received an opinion from Herbert R. O'Conor, attorney general of Maryland, which states the police judge cannot release a prisoner from jail after the term of the prisoner has been started.

In a previous ruling, O'Conor held the judge of the Police Court could not suspend sentence or postpone execution of sentence without the approval of the State's attorney for the county.

The sheriff wrote to Attorney General O'Conor for a ruling after Judge Smith reduced the sentences of a number of persons serving terms in the jail, and had forwarded an order for the release of a prisoner some days before his term ended officially.

Judge Smith had held that in view of the wording of the law creating his office that he had as much right to suspend sentence or commute sentences already being served as the judge of the Circuit Court.

Members of the Takoma Park Town Council and leaders of civic groups will meet today at 8 p. m. in the town offices to discuss proposed charter changes.

Because of traffic danger to children attending the Takoma Park (Md.) Elementary School on Philadelphia avenue, the executive board of the Parent-Teacher Association has moved to secure added police protection near the school.

Mrs. George Cook, head of the traffic safety committee of the public health lay council of Takoma Park, will confer with Sergt. Earl C. Thomas, chief of Takoma Park police. A paper containing many questions regarding traffic law violations and what precautions can be taken will be presented to Sergt. Thomas. A similar discussion will be held by R. G. Sherburne, town councilman in charge of police, and Mrs. Lucretia Powers, principal of the school.

For some time the P.-T. A. has been dissatisfied with the traffic system, according to Mrs. George E. Robertson, president. Strict enforcement of the traffic laws is advocated.

Mrs. Powers and Sherburne are expected to work out a different dismissal schedule for the school in an effort to co-operate with police.

The executive board yesterday approved of a contribution of $10 to the dental clinic of the Montgomery Public Health Lay Committe. It also consented to sponsor two performances of an entertainment on glass-blowing for the benefit of the committee.

The history and activities of the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission were discussed by T. Howard Duckett, chairman of the board of directors, at a recent meeting of the Woodside Park Civic Association in Jessup Blair Community House, Silver Spring, Md.

John J. Reed has been elected president of the Holy Name Society of St. Michael's Catholic Church, Silver Spring, Md. Other officers elected are Paul Taggart, vice president; Albert Reising, secretary, and Edward M. Barry, treasurer. The Rev. A. J. Burgraff is spiritual director.

It was not known whether Kipling's body will be buried in Westminster Abbey, the last resting place of so many of Britain's famed sons.

The news of his death came as a sudden shock to the whole empire.

Dr. Webb-Johnson said, after the author had died: "Mr. Kipling's end was very peaceful. It came very suddenly. His wife and his daughter were with him. He put up a splendid fight and remained conscious all the time."

A little over a week ago, January 9, he had left his home in Burwash, accompanied by Mrs. Kipling, and appeared in good health as he came to London for a short stay, prior to his scheduled departure for a holiday in southern France.

Contempt Laid To Hotel Clerk In Nixon Case

Interfered With Service of Divorce Papers, Attorneys Say.

A petition asking that R. J. Conway, a clerk in the Stoneleigh Court apartments, be held in contempt of the District Supreme Court because of his alleged interference with the service of divorce papers on Mrs. Anne Cooke Nixon, third wife of Capt. Thomas Hay Nixon, was filed in the District Supreme Court yesterday by Attorneys W. Gwynn Gardiner and James M. Earnest.

The attorneys charged that the clerk warned Mrs. Nixon that a special process server was awaiting her and also told the server, H. T. Scott, a former deputy United States marshal, she was out of town. Scott said when he finally found the apartment she was occupying, he stationed himself outside the door and Conway called police to eject him.

The officers were informed of Scott's official position and refused to disturb him, but Conway, the petition charged, stationed himself in a point of vantage from which he warned Mrs. Nixon. The papers were thrown into her lap as she was driving away in an automobile.

Suit was brought against Capt. Nixon by his second wife, who charged a Pennsylvania decree divorcing them was invalid. Mrs. Nixon, the third, is a sister of Jane Cooke Scarlett, who eloped with the family chauffeur recently and is now suing for an annulment of her marriage.

3 Get Jail Terms In Stavisky Trial

Paris, Jan. 17 (AP).—Amid tears and kisses, the celebrated Stavisky scandal, which overthrew a French cabinet two years ago and let to rioting in the streets of Paris, ended tonight so far as the courts are concerned with more acquittals than convictions.

Prison terms for eight former associates of Serge (Alexandre Sacha) Stavisky, who defrauded French investors of $10,000,000, and then died of a bullet wound in a mountain cabin, were pronounced late today.

One other defendant—Deputy Gaston Bonnause—received a suspended one-year term and automatically lost his seat in the chamber, while beautiful Mm. Arlette Stavisky, the swindler's widow, and ten other persons were acquitted.

Zaggustave Tissier, manager of the municipal pawnshop at Bayonne, whose confession broke the case wide open, received the heavist sentence—seven years.

Vincent de Moro-Giafferi, Mme. Stavisky's lawyer, kissed her when the verdict was read. Both were weeping for joy.

How to Keep Colds UNDER better CONTROL

At the first warning nasal irritation, sniffle or sneeze, use Vicks Va-tro-nol—just a few drops up each nostril. Va-tro-nol is especially designed for the nose and upper throat—where most colds start. It stimulates Nature's own functions—in the nose—to help prevent colds, and to throw off head colds in their early stages. Used in time, Va-tro-nol helps avoid many colds.

Caught a Cold?.. Vicks VapoRub helps End a Cold Sooner

If a cold has developed, rub Vicks VapoRub on throat and chest at bedtime. VapoRub acts direct—two ways at once: (1) By stimulation through the skin like a poultice or plaster; (2) By inhalation of its medicated vapors direct to inflamed air-passages. Through the night, this combined vapor-poultice action loosens phlegm, soothes irritation, helps break congestion.

Will Become Effective With Opening of Two New County Exchanges.

ARLINGTON COUNTY BUREAU OF THE POST.
Tel. Clar 500. Clarendon, Va.

A substantial reduction in telephone rates for part of Arlington County will be effective Tuesday, it was announced yesterday by John A. Cummins, manager at Clarendon for the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of Virginia. The reduction will come with the opening of two new exchanges at Aurora Hills.

This is the second announced reduction in rates within the last two months. It will affect approximately 1,700 subscribers, of whom 400 reside within the area to be served by the new exchanges.

Under the new arrangement residents within the area to be served by the new exchanges, which include Aurora Hills, Virginia Highlands, Arlington Ridge, South Washington, Oakcrest and Club Manor, will be transferred from the Clarendon exchange to the two new exchanges to be know as Jackson and Ridge. The Ridge exchange will replace Clarendon for local service and those desiring the combined local and Walnut service will be placed on the Jackson exchange.

Zone 1. Walnut service, unlimited, from $6 to $4.75.

Zone 2. Walnut service, unlimited from $6 to $5.25. This service was $6.50 and $7 prior to the reductions made last November.

Zone 3. Walnut service, unlimited, from $6.50 to $5.75. This service was $7.50 prior to the November reduction.

Pursuant to a request made by the Jefferson Civic League in which area the new exchanges will be located, Cummins states that there will be "open house" during the week of January 27, when the public will be invited to visit the new offices.

In order to facilitate the handling of incoming calls Cummins requests the co-operation of customers in acquainting those people who frequently call them with the new numbers that will be used after the change.

Maxwell Girl's Defense Plans Appeal Steps

By Virginia Lee Warren.
A Staff Correspondent.

Wise, Va., Jan. 17.—The staff of counsel defending Edith Maxwell today was deciding details of the appeal of her conviction for the murder of her father to the State Supreme Court of Appeals.

Edith is under a 25-year prison sentence.

Judge H. A. W. Skeen yesterday denied a petition for a new trial, sought on grounds of new evidence. This evidence was the opinion of competent medical officers that the autopsy of her father, Trigg Maxwell, had not establis ed that her blows were the cause of his death.

Previously Judge Skeen had denied another petition for a new trial based on contentions of counsel that Edith's constitutional rights were not fully protected at her trial.

Contributors to The Post's defense fund yesterday were Grace Denny, 50 cents; N. T. G., $1, and D. H. B., $1. This brought the fund total to $822.68.

Hauptmann's Reprieve.

Emotional outbursts following the reprieve of Bruno Richard Hauptmann indicate that the saturnalian atmosphere of the Flemington trial has not fully subsided. Without waiting to determine what led Gov. Hoffman to delay the execution, his critics are wildly and intemperately demanding the shedding of blood. Such exhibitions shamefully cloud the whole problem of administering justice fairly, deliberately and at the same time relentlessly.

Gov. Hoffman has unwisely stimulated irresponsible criticism by his lack of candor with the public. Certainly if he had a good reason for issuing the reprieve, he should either have announced it simultaneously, or given reasons for not so doing. His failure to clarify his attitude is as unfortunate for the wretched principal in this sordid drama as it is stimulating to the sadists and sentimentalists who insist upon projecting themselves into the case. But there is no indication that this fogginess of policy is in any way tainted by politics or opportunism.

Gov. Hoffman should be commended for resolving doubts in favor of the convicted slayer, if there is any reasonable possibility that his execution would later be revealed as a miscarriage of justice. No doubt the Governor feels his responsibility in the matter the more keenly because of the circus antics indulged in during the trial. In dealing with a case that has so shaken the foundation of our criminal justice system, no conscientious executive could do otherwise.

Charges that the Governor is exploiting the case for publicity are palpably absurd, for granting a reprieve to a man convicted of slaying the Lindbergh child is one of the most unpopular acts a State executive could perform. Since Gov. Hoffman took that step knowing that it would probably unloose an avalanche of emotional criticism against him, he must at least be given credit for courage and sincerity. If not excessive, his caution in protecting New Jersey against any possibility of an irreparable mistake will in the long run redound to his credit with all who are interested in the basic problems of administering justice.

Soil Conservation?

There is no pressing economic emergency to justify the breathless haste with which the Administration is drafting a farm program to take the place of the AAA. Indeed, the Supreme Court decision came at an especially opportune time, after farm prices had reached satisfactory levels, with prospects excellent for a sustained demand for agricultural products. Hence, fear that votes will be lost with cessation of rental and benefit payments is the only plausible explanation for the Administration's efforts to provide a temporary substitute for the outlawed AAA.

The kind of stop-gap legislation under discussion is patently intended to "get around" the Supreme Court decision by linking production control with soil conservation projects. Amendments to the soil conservation act, made with that end in view, would almost certainly be declared unconstitutional in view of the sweeping terms of the decision in the Hoosac Mills case.

It was there made clear that the Supreme Court was prepared to sweep aside patent subterfuges designed to conceal the fact that the Federal Government had undertaken to regulate agricultural operations within the States. The objections raised in the majority opinion would not be overcome by calling rental and benefit payments by other names and pretending that a crop reduction plan is a proposal to conserve land by cutting down acreage.

Unquestionably the country ought to carry through plans for conserving the fertility of the soil. That is a form of farm relief that is in the national interest and is a fitting subject of Federal concern. In his Nebraska address, former President Hoover advocated a system of direct subsidies to permit land to be put to better use and thus bring about a "balanced agriculture in full production and increased fertility in our soils." To carry out a program of this sort, however, requires prolonged study and systematic gradual execution.

A bona fide conservation program will not be developed in haste as a temporary expedient for aiding farmers. Moreover, it should not be confused with production control measures designed to raise the prices of farm products with little regard for the long-time consequences of such action.

Utterly Discredited.

No single incident serves to explain the outburst of pent-up resentment which now threatens to sweep the Senate Munitions Committee out of existence. Senator Nye's charge that President Wilson "falsified," in testifying to his knowledge of the Allies' secret treaties, was only the final straw which has broken public endurance with respect to this protracted witch-burning orgy. So utterly discredited has the "investigation" become that no defense on any particular point is now capable of restoring its usefulness.

This is the more unfortunate because of the committee's great potential value, and the constructive service which, in the early stages of the probe, it rendered in shedding light on unsavory activities by certain munition makers and their agents. Had the inquiry remained on this plane, and had those who directed it shown themselves possessed of a judicial and objective spirit, its efforts might well have been of enduring value to this country and to the world.

Gradually but steadily, however, the whole affair has degenerated into a posturing, publicity-seeking, mud-slinging spree in which an effort to pillory individuals, and to fit selected facts into a preconceived picture, has swept away all vestiges of constructive inquiry. Dissatisfaction with this course on the part of many Senators has long been apparent. But Senators Nye and Clark, for reasons best known to themselves, have deliberately chosen to press on with tactics to which other members of the committee have now felt it essential to give public repudiation.

In the spirit with which the prosecution has been conducted throughout, Senator Nye is now endeavoring to attribute blame for the blow-up to various malevolent interests. That sort of defense was to be expected. As a matter of fact the total collapse of the committee's influence is attributable only to the way in which it has converted what should have been a most careful inquiry to a pitiful exhibition of spiteful futility.

It is essential to realize, moreover, that this committee has not merely wasted valuable time and public money, but has also accomplished very positive damage to national welfare. It has spread throughout the land a pathetic belief that the complicated disease of war can be exorcized by a jumble of threats and incantations. The medieval attitude, that some personal devil explained whatever pox or plague was current in the community, has been sedulously spread abroad by Senators Nye and Clark, and is writ large in the neutrality legislation which they sponsor.

Now that the whole hocus-pocus is so thoroughly exploded it is of the first importance to examine this pending legislation realistically. The process will show that it is as full of bungling blunders as were the inquisitorial tactics of those who assumed that this Senatorial investigation should be a fragmentary selection of evidence favoring a prejudiced conclusion reached in advance of testimony.

Over Eternity Range.

Lazarus is back from the land of the dead. After almost 56 days in that mournful bourne from whose shores few travelers return, Lincoln Ellsworth is in contact with civilization, with nothing more to complain of than a bad cold.

On November 23 the Polar Star rose above the chill waters off Dundee Island, on that part of Antarctica's coast which is nearest the tip of South America. Ellsworth and his pilot, Hollick-Kenyon, turned her nose southward toward the pole in another attempt to cross the frozen continent to Little America, Admiral Byrd's frozen village on the opposite side.

On the first endeavor Ellsworth had retreated before chill mist boiling over the granite teeth of an unknown mountain range. On the second, a leaky oil line forced a return. But the third seemed auspicious. The southern sun swung low, but clear in the everlasting twilight. The plane, mounting to 10,000 feet, roared southward at 125 miles an hour on the first leg of the 2,800-mile flight.

Breasting Eternity Range, the Polar Star leveled out over the vast plateau of interior Antarctica—a land of everlasting silence so far as the voice or cry of any living creature is concerned, a frozen quiet broken only by the howling of the wind and the crackling of the frost.

The radio buzzed forth a last message—all was well, their position was almost halfway across—and then frozen silence swallowed them. For three days the disappearance made headlines in the homeland. Stefanssen speculated that "with wind, temperature and terrain all in their favor," their chances for reaching Little America were 90 per cent good. Admiral Byrd thought it "a reasonable conclusion that Ellsworth is either at or near Little America."

But after these three days the magnitude of other events crowded them from the news. Yesterday they came back via a 13,000-mile radio message from the British ship Discovery II, anchored off the great ice shelf above Little America. The Polar Star had completed her transcontinental flight on schedule, after her radio apparatus broke, although empty gas tanks brought her down just 20 miles short of the goal. Completing it with their sledge, the two men dug in at Little America where for 56 monotonous days they waited.

So Lazarus, having crossed Eternity Range, is back in the land of the living. He will find it little changed. On the whole, pretty much the same old world.

The Dangers Of Secrecy.

Secretary Morgenthau's unsuccessful effort to withhold the details of his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee is as difficult to understand or excuse as was his refusal to state unequivocally his position on the bonus. Thanks are due to Senator Couzens and Senator Bailey for insisting that it is in the public interest to disseminate pertinent facts about the state of Government finances and the probable effects of bonus payments upon the Federal credit.

It is pre-eminently the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to offer guidance to legislators who seek advice, and to oppose any spending program that runs counter to sound fiscal policies. Nevertheless, Secretary Morgenthau not only seems to prefer secrecy to open declarations, but is apparently unwilling to indorse the conclusions that any intelligent man would inevitably draw from his testimony before the Finance Committee.

Thus, after emphasizing the appalling size of the borrowing program ahead of the Government and the precarious nature of investment support for Government bond issues at all times, he refused to express a positive opinion as to the effect of bonus legislation. In response to questioning, however, he conceded that bonus payments "would not help" the bond market.

The Secretary's ultra-cautious attitude is due apparently to a mistaken conviction that knowledge is dangerous. "What I might say, if it became public property, or was discussed on the floor of the Senate or the House, might have a very adverse effect on the Government's credit," he explained to the committee. In response to a question he added that his fears were due to the danger of misinterpretation. Whereupon Senator Bailey pointed out that "on that basis no statement could ever be made, because all statements are liable to misinterpretation."

Under a democratic form of government the people are entitled to know the facts about their government that vitally concern them. Otherwise a democracy cannot operate. It is extremely short-sighted, therefore, to assume that a frank and open discussion of fiscal problems constitutes a threat to the public credit. If spending and taxing policies are sound, there is nothing to fear. If they are not, the danger signals should be sounded before it is too late. The resignation of T. Jefferson Coolidge, Undersecretary of the Treasury, should serve as a strong warning that caution is essential. Mr. Coolidge is reliably reported to be opposed to certain New Deal policies, including the spending extravagances which have reached a climax in the bonus agitation.

The Treasury owes it to the country to explain the real significance of the huge and growing volume of indebtedness and to support the President in his demand that new taxes be voted if Congress insists upon passing legislation calling for additional outlays of Federal funds.

What Price Glory?

New Yorkers are accustomed to life on schedule. They get up by alarm clocks, punch time clocks, work by electric clocks and get home in time to get to bed and start the whole routine all over again next morning. In order to accomplish this, they put their fares in the subway turnstiles and their faith in electrical systems. That anything should occur to upset this routine is unthinkable, but these days the unthinkable happens.

Late Wednesday afternoon virtually all of New York City north of Fifty-ninth street was plunged into darkness by a mere short circuit. Merchants and housewives reverted to horse-and-buggy days and made use of the old-fashioned but untemperamental candle. Thousands were without even this much solace. There were the usual groans, curses, questions, philosophy and resignation on the part of a myriad of victims.

Residents of New York City, as of every city, are happily unaware of how much their daily lives depend on the infallibility of mechanisms. Operations are scheduled; theater tickets are bought; engagements are contracted; invitations are accepted; subways are boarded; elevators are entered—yet all may come to naught at the explosion of a single fuse.

Mussolini says he's willing to negotiate with Ethiopian government officials on a give-and-take basis. Yes—give 'em hell and take their country.

The American idea of poverty is to have such a small income that you can buy only necessities.

Railroads And Laws.

From the Memphis Commercial Appeal.

Edward E. Loomis, president of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, recalls that there are now pending in the Congress 875 bills affecting railroads. About 800 of these if enacted into law would increase the operating expense of the roads.

It is, of course, important to know that among these bills are the six-hour day bill, the full-crew bill, enlargement of employers' liability, modification of hours of service limits, Government inspection of track, and so on. But it is more important to understand the scope of Government interference in a private business. Not only does the Government undertake to control the financing of the railroads of the country, but it dips into their operation.

Business must be released from regulation and threatened regulation. Private initiative and enterprise must be restored to industry. The sooner the Government gets out of business the better it will be for business, and the better it will be for the country.

Need For Criticism.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: Returning to Washington to live in August, 1935, after living in New York City for two years, I was much impressed with what had been done with The Post.

I am not one who believes the present Administration even approaches a state of perfection. Neither am I one who thinks the Republicans hold the secret of economic happiness and security. Further, I think constructive criticism is indispensable in a real democracy.

I should like to see The Post be a pioneer in the Nation's Capital and be courageous enough to cite some merits in even such a program as the AAA. A CITIZEN.

Elderman, How Could You?

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: Anent your editorial page cartoon of the 5th instant: Who ever saw a pacing donkey, mule or jackass? And yet here we have a pacer, or or "racker" (or "sidewheeler," an it please you) going down hill, heltosplit, loaded.

From time immemorial the mule has been a beast of burden; not so much the carrying on his back as in being a draft animal. And, as such, all his pulling is done with his hind legs, one at a time. That being the case, his front legs are for balancing or steadying use only. He does not pull an ounce with them.

Imagine a mule trying to pull fore and aft on the port side and then endeavoring to shift over to starboard. Even the genus asinus would have better judgment than to make the attempt, even if Mother Nature so far forgot herself as to let him try—however much the President may decide to ride a pacing jackass. Truly your artist has given us the Eighth Wonder—a pacing mule!

Angels and ministers of grace, defend us from the vagaries of genius!

A Protestant's View.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: I am a Protestant Episocopalian, with which my people have been associated since separating from the mother church in England, and with that church back to Henry VIII, and before him, back to Joseph of Arimathea.

I resent the views of certain Roman Catholics who now are taking funds, in salaries, from my church while traitorously attacking it. Further, I resent such statements as published by you on January 4, over the signature of Jeanne F. Arnaud. She complains of "divisionism" and would laud the claim to "authority;" but this has been the attitude of dictators and despots down through the ages. James Cardinal Gibbons has set out in his biography by A. S. Will, learned to feel that the claim to infallibility was wrong and that the American bishops, except himself and a few others, were right in 1870. And, if my churchmen weigh success only upon prohibition, then the Roman Catholic Church in America as represented by Cardinal Gibbons, also failed; for James Cardinal Gibbons was a prohibitionist. See the 1922 edition of his biography.

Not only am I a Protestant Episcopalian, but I am a Protestant. You will find Protestantism in all countries where there is an approach to democracy. You will not find a strong Protestantism where the soil produces despotism.

Only Protestantism includes the philosophy of free government, free judgement, divided authority, states rights, equality of opportunity in proportion as one (or a group) contributes to the social good of the whole, mass education, and an individual and group sense of social responsibility.

These so-called Episcopalians are traitors not only to John Wycliffe, Martin Luther et al, but because Protestantism alone embraces the last stated philosophy, traitors to Washington, Jefferson, Jackson and every other great man this Nation has produced. G. G. MOORE.

Not The FHA's Fault.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: The editorial, "Our Housing Shortage," in the issue of January 10 blames Federal agencies concerned with stimulating home construction for Washington's housing shortage.

If the writer of the editorial were in the market for a home, as the wife and I have been for the past two years, and had contacted bankers, builders and Federal agencies, he certainly would not put the blame on FHA. Banks not operating under FHA will seldom lend you more than 50 per cent of the appraised value of the property and are leery of financing the building of homes. Building and loan associations frown on loans over 70 per cent.

But the FHA will guarantee loans of 80 per cent, and through its unbiased and expect appraisal and construction supervision insure that you get real value for every dollar spent.

There are plenty of new homes being built and on sale—some for $9,250, the most for $9,950, $10,500, $12,000 or more. Homes, however, which are not geared to the average man's income and ability to pay.

In this fact, I believe, lies Washington's home shortage. There are practically no low-cost homes being built—homes between $2,500 and $6,500, or even $6,500 and $8,000—for the $1,500 to $2,500-a-year Government clerk.

In 1935 builders and bankers built 70,000 homes in the United States. In England, with one-third our population, builders and bankers, cooperating with their government, built 330,000 new homes and put England well on the road to economic recovery. Why was England's home building program a success and ours a flop? Because English bankers and English builders actually provided homes at low cost—homes which fitted the average man's pocketbook.

The United States, states the committee for economic recovery, needs 10,000,000 homes costing between $2,500 and $6,000 apiece—most at $4,000. That means there is $40,000,000,000 worth of business in building alone awaiting bankers and builders. If American builders and bankers came to earth and cooperated with Federal housing agencies for providing low-cost homes, instead of trying to discredit and undermine them, the depression would be knocked for a row of tin cans.

'Twixt Swinburne And Kipling?

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: In an editorial of this morning, you refer to Masefield as "the poet laureate of England, . . . successor to Scott, Wordsworth, Tennyson." I know that Wordsworth and Tennyson were poets laureate—that Masefield is poet laureate now. But what about Scott? I suppose he held the honor between the time that Swinburne resigned it and Kipling was given it.

Threats Against The Courts.

To the Editor of The Post—Sir: Never in a long life can the writer recall when there was so much confused and unintelligent thought on public questions as appears to prevail today among all classes.

Take, for instance, the threats that are now being made against the courts. Because, in the discharge of their constitutional duty, they have invalidated most of the New Deal laws, which any well-informed layman would have known were unconstitutional, certain demagogic politicians and unthinking people are threatening the courts with the destruction of the powers they now exercise either by laws or constitutional amendment, forgetting or ignorant of the fact that the balance of powers, and the independence of the judiciary are the most distinguishing characteristics of our scheme of government, and the only real contribution we made to the science of government.

But for the independence of the judiciary there would be little security for our liberties and property rights, for the greatest danger in our governmental scheme to our liberties and property rights is not the courts, but the legislative department, as evidenced by the people's present distrust of our legislators, and the efforts made to curb them by the initiative and referendum and other constitutional limitations.

Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of democracy, said in a letter to Madison in 1789 that not the powers of the courts or the Executive, but "the tyranny of the legislative power is really the danger most to be feared" in our Government. In all countries where the courts are not independent of the executive and legislative departments tyranny is a constantly threatening danger and often exists. Curtis, in his work on the Constitution, said: "The judicial power of the United States, considered with reference to its adaptation to the purposes of its creation, is one of the most admirable and felicitous structures that human governments have exhibited." And De Tocqueville says, in his "Democracy in America": "The power vested in the American courts of justice of pronouncing a statute to be unconstitutional forms one of the most powerful barriers which has ever been devised against the tyranny of political assemblies."

And finally, old John Marshall, than whom no wiser or greater judge ever lived, said in the Virginia Convention of 1829: "I have always thought, from my earliest youth till now, that the greatest scourge that an angry heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt or a dependent judiciary."

Should the threats be pressed to interfere with the present powers and independence of our courts no fears need be felt as to the results, because the people have, by far, more confidence in the courts than they have, in either the Congress or the Executive, and they will never tolerate the subordination of the courts to either.

Supper Season

THE farmer's wife has many chores. She's busy in and out of doors. She sees the hungry chickens fed; prepares the meals and bakes the bread; and with a zeal that does not tire puts kindling on the kitchen fire. Her sons feel appetite awake. They know she means to bake a cake.

But when mother has the cake baked she takes it to Community Hall or Parish Hall or some other hall where the church is giving a supper and if sons want a piece of that cake they'll have to buy it.

The farmer toils through summer heat and raises corn and hogs and wheat and gives the wheel of fortune praise for wheat, corn, hogs he doesn't raise. And his tobacco profits may increase by what he throws away. Is he a puzzled man? Gee whiz! He'll tell the cock-eyed world he is.

But being a farmer, not a political economist, he goes to the church supper and takes his family with him, paying at the door. This is the season of church suppers. The farmer goes to them all. He goes to the other fellows' church suppers and the other fellows come to his church suppers. That's fair enough. There's nothing denominational about church suppers; there's nothing sectarian about good food. And the food is of the very best.

Roast turkey, dressing, sweet potatoes, cranberry sauce and sliced tomatoes, potato salad, likewise chicken, the pulse to quicken, the waist to thicken, horse radish, pickalilly, slaw with oysters fried and oysters raw. With oysters panned and oysters stewed we're filled with more than gratitude.

I'm not saying that the giving of church suppers is peculiar to St. Mary's County. What I do say is that they are given here with a zest and enthusiasm unexcelled elsewhere. They begin in early October and proceed apace. Only once in a great while do dates clash. This is always a sad accident for which regrets are expressed and apologies made. But ordinarily it is a sweet progression which enables men to meet their fellows and get instruction as well as victuals.

Sans hesitations and compunctions they plough their way through festive functions; of knowledge much increase their yield but rather far afield and sew some interesting facts on various digestive tracts. While conversation never stops with knives and forks they reap their crops.

Of course not all the supper patrons are practical working farmers. There are clergymen present and lawyers and doctors and garage men and carpenters and builders and ancient guys who are loafing in the country after working in the city; but they are all farmers after a fashion; some have farms and some play at farming; and 90 per cent know something about a venerable trade that is ever presenting new aspects.

Right cheerfully you'll see them go from Point Lookout to Chaptico and, other nights, without a doubt, from Chaptico to Point Lookout. 'Twixt Cedar Point and Valley Lee a pleasant interchange you'll see. Elsewhere no greater joys they'd know. And where the elsewhere could they go?

By the time the supper season is over everybody has seen everybody else in the county. For when the churches have been exhausted the social organizations and the educational institutions and the women's clubs take their turn. And the hospital must be served. And the Volunteer Fire Department.

It is the women, bless 'em, who are responsible for the suppers. They plan them, collect the food, cook and serve. And there is no skimping. Before you have finished your turkey and cranberry sauce the girls come around with baked ham and fried oysters and chicken salad, and the pickles and preserves and hot rolls are on the table. And there is no limit but capacity to the hot coffee. A man has a full and contented feeling when he leaves the table at last and goes to the back of the hall and smokes and talks.

Ay, men are favored more and more. One man takes tickets at the door. Another man the girls engage to make announcements from the stage concerning games or cakes for sale. But all the rest just tell the tale of doings wise and otherwise. Good lands! Ain't they the lucky guys?

• • • •

And when all is over the ladies get busy totaling up receipts. All they have taken in come.. close to being clear profit. Pretty nearly. The colored women who wash the dishes and clean up generally are made happy and are not permitted to go home empty handed.

Ay, blest the county, and with reason, that has a joyous supper season; here "Time, the venerable sprinter," right blithely ushers in the winter by carrying a well-filled tray and bids toil-weary men be gay. And cheerful, kindly, are the fairies that wait on us in Old St. Mary's! GRIF ALEXANDER.

College Men.

From the Boston Transcript.

Gov. Talmadge of Georgia insists that the next Cabinet be composed of men "who never went beyond the eighth grade in school." He is suspicious of collegians. Still, even Washington had a college man in his Cabinet—a man whom sound Democrats even now delight to honor.

Fair Enough

By Westbrook Pegler

The American Nobility.

Paris, Jan. 17.

THE American nobility in France has been considerably reduced in numbers since the great panic of 1929, but that is not to say that the colony has been wiped out. There are still enough of them to make a showing in Paris and along the Riviera, where, like Aga Kahn of Bombay, they are maintained in great comfort by their subjects back home.

The method of obtaining contributions differs, but the effect is about the same. The Aga Khan, being the god of 5,000,000 Mohammedans, receives tithes from the faithful, but American nobility get theirs in dividends or royalties. In the long run, however, the income of Americans of this class is produced by the labor of countless impersonal subjects in mines, mills, factories and fields and is transmitted to France, where it is spent on villas, horses, gowns, jewelry and other necessities of life of the nobility.

The Aga Khan can hardly be expected to have a personal acquaintance with each of his 5,000,000 faithful followers, and, similarly, an absentee American of noble status cannot hope to know the names of all the working people at home whose little individual contributions all go to create an income sufficient to maintain him or her abroad.

Anyway, these subjects are always dying and being succeeded by their sons and daughters. The nobility, of course, die, too, and hand down their possessions to their sons and daughters, who continue to live in France, while their hereditary subjects continue to live in America and carry on their task of providing the income.

• • • •

THERE is a tendency among destructive critics to object to this arrangement on the ground that this class of Americans are parasites on the body of the American working class and never do any good in the world. This is an ignorant point of view, because the good works of the American nobility among the poor people of France are famous throughout the world. In former years they were always signing checks for thousands of francs for the rehabilitation of French villages which were destroyed in the war or for the relief of poor industrial centers.

It may be true, as some people have said now and again, that this money being provided by the American working people would be more at home if used to rehabilitate some American villages in Arkansas, for example, where the condition of the peasants never was any too good, or to provide shoes for that large group whom Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, so tactlessly described as the shoeless tenth.

But the point there is that the American friend of France can make a much greater impression with a contribution of 5,000 francs in France than with the equivalent sum of $330 at home. The 5,000 francs not only buys more bricks and shoes in France but makes a much more resounding figure than $330. Thus, for approximately $1,000 produced by the labor of the American working people a member of our nobility residing in France can donate the magnificent sum of 15,000 francs for rehabilitation or relief and acquire the status of a benefactor.

UNTIL two years ago, thanks to the low prices of everything in France which prevailed until America went off the gold standard, a benefactor could save the amount of the donation, which thus came out of the people of France. This situation does not exist any more, but, on the other hand, benefactions are fewer and smaller now.

When America was still on gold and the American working people were conscientiously at work instead of loafing and grumbling on the dole, a member of the society colony in France could do magnificent things of a charitable character with an American income and still come up with a profit on the year, thanks to the difference in prices. In 1926 $1,000 bought 350,000 francs.

There is no rigid scale of prices for the various grades of the French Legion of Honor, but any benefactor who gave 15,000 francs or more and did not receive a red ribbon may regard himself or herself as cheated. The higher grades naturally cost more, and altogether you may say that the Legion of Honor in its graduated ranks has yielded more book profit for less outlay than any other enterprise in the world.

It is a distinct handicap to the American lower classes that they are not picturesque. They do not wear smocks or wooden shoes or drive oxen, and old ladies do not sit by doors on sunny days knitting lace caps. The corresponding class of Americans wear ragged overalls and no shoes at all, and they rather drive skinny mules through cotton fields or pull the plows themselves. And old ladies sitting by doors on sunny days present a repugnant picture as they pole snuff around their gums or smoke their pipes, which are quite different from Parisian cigarets with a satin tip in the same color as one's lipstick.

• • • •

BUT probably the worst handicap of the American lower classes in their competition with the French for the bounty of American nobility residing abroad is the lack of anything approximating the French notion of the Legion of Honor. The Governor of Arkansas and the Governor of Pennsylvania, with his unemployed miners, might wish to investigate the possibilities of profit in a State Legion of Honor.

It is not to be imagined, of course, that such a decoration would attract large numbers of French nobility to the United States and move them to donate dollars for the relief of American distress. The French are fond of decorations, but their self-control in the face of temptation when a decoration is going to cost them money is one of the wonders of the world.

An Ancient Disease

Silicosis Long Recognized As Mining Hazard, With South Africa And International Labor Office Leading Fight Against It.

By Leifur Magnusson.

Special Correspondence of The Post.

Mr. Magnusson is director of the Washington Bureau of the International Labor Office.

THE recent discovery of the plight of hundreds of workers who helped to build a water-carrying tunnel under the Gauley Mountain in West Virginia once more focuses the attention of the public on silicosis, that dreaded foe of all underground workers. The disease is a form of tuberculosis, contracted largely through the inhalation of silica and dust containing particles of silica, which is a quartz crystal. It has long been recognized as an occupational disease, and it comes as a shock, therefore, to find that the tragedy in West Virginia is being talked of as something new and unknown.

Twenty-five years ago, the Union of South Africa began systematically to study the disease to devise preventive measures and to compensate for injuries and loss of time from its effects. The doctors on the Witwatersrand had had cognizance of it as far back as in the first decade of the century.

Ten years ago the workers' group in the International Labor Organization, speaking particularly for the stone workers, miners and pottery workers, asked that the respiratory diseases common to workers in these groups should be among those entitled to compensation under the accident insurance treaty which had been agreed upon in general conference in 1925. The then director of the International Labor office, Albert Thomas, had his experts make inquiries of the experience of the different countries as to the occurrence of respiratory diseases among workers in stone and mineral-working processes where dust is prevalent.

The advisory committee on industrial hygiene of the office made the replies from the different governments the basis of further research of the disease. The office experts included a lengthy article on silicosis in "Occupation and Health," an encyclopedia of industrial hygiene that began to appear in installments in 1925.

HERE, then, was an extensive focus of public attention that was exceedingly effective and led subsequently to international action. Silicosis was seen as an industrial problem that had emerged from the inner shrine of the doctors to the forum of the layman.

At this point the South African government, in connection with mining operations on the Witwatersrand, revealed the ravages of silicosis among its miners and drew the attention of the world to the subject in a most practical and effective manner. It told the International Labor Office of its experience with this disease and invited the help of the office to find out what could be done in the way of remedial action. The result was the calling of an international conference of experts on silicosis in order to exchange experiences and opinions with regard to the disease. The conference was held in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 1930, in order that the experts invited would have an opportunity to acquaint themselves at first hand with the remarkable work done by the Miners' Phtisis Bureau of the Rand in combating this disease.

Invitations were sent to experts in Australia, Canada, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, The Netherlands, the Union of South Africa and the United States. It is natural that the United States should have accepted with alacrity, The American Public Health Service had been quietly at work for many years studying the disease and was familiar with it as an incidence to work in mines and stone quarries. The men who went to the conference from the United States were Dr. Albert E. Russell, of the United States Public Health Service, and Dr. Leroy V. Gardner, of the Trudeau Sanatorium. Drs. Russell and Gardner are now members of the advisory committee on industrial hygiene of the International Labor Office, together with Dr. R. R. Sayers and Dr. L. R. Thompson, of the United States Public Health Service. All of these men are recognized experts on silicosis.

EACH delegate to the Johannesburg conference was asked to write a paper either on the problem of silicosis in his particular country or on that particular scientific aspect of it with which he was specially competent to deal. These papers were then used as a basis for the discussions of the conference, which considered them in the light of three questions namely, the medical aspects of silicosis, preventive measures, and compensation. The printed proceedings of the conference are an encyclopedia of information on silicosis. Not only are there articles on the diagnosis, pathology and symptomatology of the disease, but very practical guides to prevention and treatment of it.

The Johannesburg conference was able to agree on certain recommendations which it submitted to the International Labor Office for guidance and consideration. The recommendations had to do with general principles to be followed for prevention, compensation and after-care, the desirability of uniformity in terminology and radiographic technique, and the urgent necessity for further scientific research into some of the causes of the disease.

On the basis of these recommendations, together with further study by its committee on industrial hygiene, the International Labor Conference in 1934 revised its treaty of 1925 on the subject of workmen's compensation for occupational diseases and included silicosis in the list of compensable diseases. The United States was represented at the conference by a full delegation of observers. The exact description in the list for purposes of compensation is as follows: "Silicosis, with or without pulmonary tuberculosis, provided that silicosis is an essential factor in causing the resultant incapacity or death."

• • • •

IT is yet too early to record any wide acceptance of this revised convention, but the convention is now in force in two countries—Hungary and Norway—and it is expected that others will follow. The real point is that the larger and more important mining and quarrying countries already have careful legislation on the subject and are prepared to ratify at almost any moment. In the meantime, their domestic laws are operative to take care of the situation.

On a national scale, eighteen countries have included silicosis in their lists of compensable diseases. These are: Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Germany, Great Britain, Japan, Mexico, New Zealand, South Africa, Sweden, Switzerland, and the U. S. S. R.

In the United States, ten States—California, Connecticut, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin—compensate workman for injuries arising from silicosis. It is disconcerting not to find on this list all of the prominent mining and quarrying States of the Union, while West Virginia is significantly absent. Yet the number of States that do compensate for the disease is sufficient to indicate that there should not be complete ignorance of the incidence of silicosis and its ravages.

Traffic Jitters

By Karl Schriftgiesser

Constitutional Rights.

THERE are several subjects which always can be counted upon to start an argument and the greatest of these is traffic. This is especially true in Washington, which is still essentially a small town, but which has a traffic problem nearly commensurate with true urban conditions. The lack of industry and its attendant lack of heavy trucking makes the problem pretty much one of what to do with passenger cars, but even without huge factories and warehouses such as Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia or other large Eastern cities have to contend with, the situation is pretty messy, as that eminent journalist, Mr. Howard "Barrymore" Wentworth, has recently revealed.

While Mr. Wentworth has been riding around in a police cruiser I have been taking a walk, but from now on I am going to insist upon police protection myself, on constitutional grounds. After several daring escapades at Washington street corners, during which I have become but a shadow of my former self, I have arrived at the conclusion that for every pedestrian there should be two armed and burly guards whose sole duty should be to help the able-bodied across the street. I refer, of course, only to those street corners, like Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets downtown, where some sadistically minded authority has installed traffic lights. If the lights were removed, and with them their false sense of safety, I am sure life would not be so hectic as it now is.

It's those darned cars which turn corners that have got me down. I go around these days a completely nervous wreck and my poor neck is out of joint from looking behind me. Like thousands of other Washingtonians I have a fear complex which assails me even in my sleep, and night after night I awake in a cold sweat, fearful that just as I step from the sidewalk on a red light some one of Mr. Wentworth's autoist friends will come climbing up my back.

• • • •

THESE jitters, I find, are by no means an uncommon malady in the District, but they might easily be relieved if the authorities would get over their mulish objection to affording pedestrian protection at corners where turns are allowed. The old system of allowing pedestrians to cross on the red-yellow combination might work, or, better still, between the shift from red to green the four lights should all burn red. At this moment the poor pedestrian could be king and walk across the street in comparative safety.

It really doesn't matter how they do it, so long as the Forgotten Man is given a chance. Only yesterday the Post Impressionist and I were endeavoring to get some lunch down the street, but every time we put a foot forward at the corner of Thirteenth and E streets a car would swing out of E street and charge us down. I didn't mind, because I am pedestrian by breeding, but the Impressionist is an elderly gentleman and I felt very sorry for him. Finally we got across by waiting for the lights on Thirteenth street to turn green and dashing for the far sidewalk before the cars, which then had the right to move on Thirteenth street, had a chance to get going. I suppose if Mr. Wentworth's lieutenants had seen us they would have bawled us out for breaking the law.

In fact, a cop did bawl me out for just that the other day. I stood on my constitutional grounds.

"You'll be lying on your back at Emergency if you try standing on them too often at this corner," he growled.

So I put it to him this way:

"See here, cop," I said. "You see those cars there? Well, every one of them is on the street because I give them permission to."

• • • •

HE muttered something about holding me for observation, so I hurried on. I explained to him that a license was in reality nothing but a slip of paper giving its holder permission to operate a car and that the driver only had it because the public as a whole was gracious enough to give it to him. He had no "right" to drive; only permission to do so.

"But I don't have to have a license to walk, do I?" I said to the cop.

I had him there! He had to admit I was right. It started him thinking, which was pretty painful to watch. He finally admitted grudgingly that everybody has a "right" to walk and doesn't need permission, or a license. But I guess thinking was too much for him, at least my kind of thinking, because when I was coming back a half hour later I finally had to dash through red lights if I ever wanted to get across.

"Who do you think you are?" he growled.

"Who? Me?" I asked in that foolish way one always answers a cop. "Oh, I'm just the Forgotten Man."

"Just another fresh guy," he said. "Life would be pretty pleasant if you birds didn't think you owned the earth."

So I guess I'll give up. And leave this traffic problem to guys like Mr. Wentworth, who's got a drag and rides around in police cars anyway.

Don't Mention It.

Farmers Favor Soil Act, Urge Dollar Control

Conference Approves New Relief Plan, Advocates Currency Reform.

Formally approving in general the Administration's proposal for farm relief through the Soil Conservation act, the National Agricultural Conference, including five of the leading farm organizations of the country, last night called also for a managed commodity dollar.

A report adopted by the conference included a recommendation for revision of the monetary and credit systems "to establish and maintain the dollar with a constant purchasing power preserving the equity of contracts between debtor and creditor."

Secretary of Agriculture hailed the report as "even more significant than that of the conference of farm leaders here last week."

Expansion of domestic and foreign markets, "legal" adjustment of production to the demands of the markets, continuance and expansion of commodity loans and "equality in credit and monetary" policies were asked. A proposed "monetary authority would be given powers to control price adjustments by repricing of gold, regulate the value of the dollar and regulate the issuance and volume of currency.

Organizations approving the report were the National Grange, American Farm Bureau Federation, National Co-operative Council, Farmers National Grain Corporation, and the National Farmers Union.

Roosevelt Cites Needs.

President Roosevelt said at a press conference yesterday that a very slight amendment to clarify certain of the provisions of the soil conservation act of 1935 would be all that was necessary to make that act serve as the vehicle of the new farm program to replace the outlawed AAA.

Referring newsmen to his statement of October 25, 1935, when he outlined a "long-time, more permanent plan for American agriculture" embodying soil conservation as a primary principle, the President expressed confidence that the soil act could be amended readily to broaden it into a well-rounded and balanced agricultural development program for the Nation.

The act, already considered one of heretofore almost unrealized breadth in its free grants of power to the Executive, would need amendment to take the soil conservation service and its employes out of the civil service class in order that AAA employes could be moved over into the enlarged agency, observers pointed out.

It also would need supplementary provisions to take care of the cotton situation, it was said on good authority.

Finance Is Problem.

The financing of the new program remained the chief problem confronting the Administration, it appeared.

President Roosevelt said in his conference that he was not ready to discuss the question of revenues, but intimated that possibly new taxes might be necessary to finance the new farm program.

In speaking of the farm situation, he stipulated that reporters refrain from concluding that he was answering the speech of former President Herbert Hoover the night before, stating he had not read Mr. Hoover's speech.

He analyzed briefly the soil conservation act and then read extracts from his October 25 statement, emphasing these remarks of that date:

"To broaden adjustment operations so as to give farmers increasing incentives for conservation and efficient use of the Nation's soil resources. . . . There was nothing sound in the situation in the past, when, spurred by ruinously low prices, farmers have been compelled to mine their soil of its fertility by over-intensive cultivation in a race to make up in value of units what they had lost in unit price. This has resulted in loss on a colossal scale. Tens of millions of acres have been abandoned because of erosion. . . . Real damage to the consumer does not result from moderate increases in food prices, but from collapse of farm income so drastic as to compel ruthless depletion of soil."

The plan to impound tariffs to obtain the necessary revenue without new taxation came from Lewis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, at a session of the national agricultural conference.

At the Capitol, Speaker Byrns told newsmen he did not believe the new farm program would require new taxes.

In the Department of Agriculture, some officials stated that since the 1936 cotton crop was in most immediate need of a program, the Administration was ready to begin leasing land under the land rental clause of the soil act at once in order to slash cotton acreage this year.

The House Agriculture Committee yesterday approved a bill appropriating $296,000,000 to pay off the "moral obligation" of the Government to farmers who signed the 1935 adjustment contracts. A similar measure was approved in Senate committee the day before.

Conference with Chester C. Davis, AAA administrator; Howard R. Tolley, soil conservation authority, and other experts in attendance, were held throughout the day by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace yesterday, it was learned, in preparing the "raw material" for Congressional legislation on the new program.

In Chicago, meanwhile, Judge James Wilkerson ruled yesterday that the refunding of about $10,000,000 impounded in court as unpaid processing taxes, must remain until the AAA case was disposed of finally by the Supreme Court of the United States. He said there was no need of "undue haste," according to the Associated Press.

Private Pension Systems Needed Declares Clark

Senator to Urge Proposal to Exempt Them From Security Law.

By the Associated Press.

Contending that private pension systems should not be abandoned as a result of the passage of the social security law, Senator Clark (Democrat) of Missouri, yesterday disclosed readiness to press for enactment of his proposal to exempt companies with pension systems from tax provisions of the act.

Saying the possibility should be recognized that the act might be held unconstitutional in the light of the Supreme Court's decisions on the railway pension act and the AAA, Clark said:

"I am concerned with the 4,000,000 people who are getting benefits from private pension system. What will happen to them if the private systems are dropped and then the Government system is held unconstitutional?"

Subcommittees of the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee met with social security experts yesterday to consider possible effects of enactment of the Clark proposal.

After the conference, Chairman Doughton (Democrat), of North Carolina, of the House group said "here is a possibility we won't get anywhere this session."

"We want to preserve fully the rights of the younger men as well as the older workers" said Chairman King (Democrat) of Utah, of the Senate sub-Committee.

Clark made his proposal last year. It was laid aside with the understanding that it would be more fully considered after an analysis by experts of the social security board.

Literary Digest Poll Discloses New Deal Loss

Read how President Roosevelt stands with the country today in the America Speaks Poll in Sunday's Washington Post.

Although professing to attach little or no significance to the final results of the Literary Digest poll on the New Deal, which shows an opposition vote 62 2-3 per cent of the ballots cast, Democratic leaders are privately worried over the direction which this straw vote indicates the political wind is blowing.

A total of 1,907,681 votes were cast in the poll, according to the final tabulation which appeared yesterday. Of these, 712,368, or 37.34 per cent, answered "yes" to the question, "Do you now approve the acts and policies of the Roosevelt New Deal to date?" The remaining voters, or 1,195,313, replied "no." In only 12 States—all traditionally Democratic, except Utah—were a majority of the voters in favor of the New Deal.

The accuracy of the Literary Digest poll has been criticized on several grounds. One is that the question is an unfair one, since few persons favor everything done in the name of the New Deal and many persons who disagree with many New Deal policies nevertheless would vote again for President Roosevelt.

Claim Poll Not Weighted.

Another criticism is that the Literary Digest poll is not weighted, as is the "America Speaks" poll appearing each Sunday in The Washington Post. The latter poll seeks to achieve a balance of ballots from persons on relief rolls, living on farms and in cities in the same proportions that those groups are to the total population of the country.

These reasons are cited by the New Dealers when they insist that the Digest poll does not accurately reflect President Roosevelt's strength with the country. But some of the party strategists admit that even when these factors are taken into consideration, the results of the Digest poll show a marked turn in the New Deal's popularity.

For instance, the Literary Digest in the poll just completed canvassed the same persons that it did in 1934, using the same question. In the poll two years ago 61.15 per cent of those voting indicated approval of the New Deal. In that tabulation a majority—in some cases slight—in every State voted approval of the New Deal. The 1934 Congressional election indicated the Democrats were stronger than two years previously.

Sharp Reversal Indicated.

Thus it appears that there has been a distinct and sharp reversal of opinion on the subject of the New Deal among the groups reached by the Literary Digest poll. One factor which may explain the difference in the result of the 1934 poll and the one just completed is that 58 per cent more persons participated in the latter than in the former, even though, as the Literary Digest explains, virtually the same list of names was used on each occasion.

Coolidge Quits Treasury

ministration's failure to take a firm stand against payment of the bonus at this time, especially the failure of Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, when he had the opportunity earlier in the week, to speak out against this proposed drain on the Treasury, moved Mr. Coolidge to submit his resignation to the President yesterday.

It would be inaccurate to say that differences over the bonus caused the Undersecretary to resign, his friends said, adding that he had no disagreement of any nature with Secretary Morgenthau or anything the Treasury chieftain did or did not do. It was not denied that the Administration's apparent indifference to the bonus movement added to Mr. Coolidge's general concern over the direction in which things were going.

Secretary Morgenthau was reported to be genuinely distressed over his chief assistant's decision that he could no longer support the New Deal. This was evidenced in a letter to Mr. Coolidge which the Treasury chief made public last night. Opening with the salutation "Dear Jeff," this letter was as follows:

Text of Letter.

"I want to express in writing as I have to you personally my sincere regret that you find it advisable to resign your position as Undersecretary of the Treasury in which you have rendered conspicuously able service to the Government for the last two years and have been of great personal assistance to me.

"I am happy to recall that our association has been most pleasant throughout and our relations always harmonious. I could not ask for more conscientious and loyal help in the many difficult problems we have had to face than you have given.

"For this fine service and support please accept my heartfelt thanks. I cherish our friendship and the feeling of mutual confidence which I know will endure."

Mr. Coolidge's letter to the President, dated yesterday, was as follows:

"It has been a very great privilege to me to serve in your Administration as Undersecretary of the Treasury during the past two years. I appreciate most deeply the honor you were good enough to grant me and thank you most sincerely for the opportunity to be of service.

"Circumstances have now arisen which make it advisable for me to tender you my resignation.

"I do this with regret and with very pleasant recollections of my associations."

Mr. Roosevelt immediately replied, accepting the resignation in a letter indicating that previous conversations on the subject had taken place. This letter, also headed "Dear Jeff," was as follows:

"I am sorry indeed that you find it necessary to submit your resignation as Undersecretary of the Treasury. I appreciate the validity of your reasons as you have expressed them to me, however, and in accordance with your wishes I am accepting the resignation to be effective February 15, 1936.

"In doing so I wish to tell you of my deep appreciation and gratitude for your loyal and able help during a difficult period. You may take satisfaction in knowing that you have rendered good service to your Government when it called upon you.

"Permit me to extend my best wishes for your future success."

In strong contrast to the restrained letter of resignation submitted by Mr. Coolidge was the effusive resignation of Mr. Robert sent to the White House January 6. The Assistant Secretary said he was resigning because of the necessity of returning "to private life and my business affairs."

He declared his service in the Treasury had been "pleasant, stimulating and educational" and that he was "deeply grateful to you for the opportunity to serve my day and generation in your great and forward-looking Administration."

"I return to the business world with the highest confidence in the security of business and society, in the economic and social rehabilitation for which you have so wisely planned and wrought," Mr. Robert added.

In a "Dear Chip" letter the President replied that "your expression of confidence in the soundness of the work we have been doing is as gratifying to me as the loyalty with which you have served throughout the last three years."

Return to Post.

Mr. Coolidge was first vice president of the First National Bank of Boston before coming to the Treasury, and it is expected that after a brief vacation he will return to that post. In the Treasury he has been in charge primarily of the Government's fiscal operations. He has been the Treasury's "market man," in charge of the flotation of loans and short-term security issues and the Liberty Loan refunding operations.

Except for the period in which the United States was in the World War, the Treasury in the last 18 months has conducted a greater volume of open market operations, under Mr. Coolidge's direction, than at any comparable period in its history. For instance, in the year which ended June 30 last the Treasury's open market issues totaled $12,099,919,493.

A large part of the Treasury's refunding of $8,000,000,000 of Liberty loan bonds took place under Mr. Coolidge's supervision. He carried out these operations without disturbance to the Government bond market, and at increasingly lower interest rates.

Bond Retirement.

He managed in particular the retirement of $545,250,150 of 2 per cent "consols" and $84,631,980 of 2 per cent Panama Canal bonds with funds taken from the so-called profit resulting from devaluation of the gold content of the dollar. Use of the "gold profit" for this purpose did not result in any inflationary results, since the operation had the effect of retiring an approximately equal amount of National Bank notes, issued against the retired bonds.

Mr. Coolidge came to the Treasury May 2, 1934, to fill the vacancy left when Mr. Morgenthau was promoted to Secretary of the Treasury after the resignation of William H. Woodin because of ill health.

Mr. Morgenthau as undersecretary succeeded Dean G. Acheson, who resigned because of disagreement with New Deal policies, particularly the Warren gold purchase scheme. Prof. O. M. W. Sprague, outstanding monetary expert, also resigned as the Treasury's economic adviser because he could not agree with the Warren plan.

Lewis Douglas resigned as director of the budget because of the Administration's spending policies and its indifference to the necessities of a balanced budget. Thomas Hewes resigned as an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury soon after Mr. Morgenthau became Secretary. Apparently there was a lack of harmony between them, for Mr. Hewes was relieved of most of his duties long before he resigned. So was Mr. Robert.

Winter Trips South Prove PopularHere

Mrs. Taft to Vacation in Mexico; Mr. and Mrs. Rublee Return.

By Evelyn Peyton Gordon.

Winter vacations for members of Capital society have become as great a boon as summer holidays. Many take this much-needed rest at Christmas time, going on short cruises to the West Indies, or Nassau. Others wait until later in the season and spend several weeks in Florida, basking in the sun, while still others plan longer trips which take them to Bermuda, through the Panama Canal to California. Still others have discovered old Mexico a charming place to spend a few weeks.

Mrs. William Howard Taft, widow of the Chief Justice and former President, takes a long winter vacation each year. Sometimes she goes to Charleston, where she remains until the famous Magnolia Gardens have bloomed, returning to her home on Wyoming avenue just in time to find her own magnolia trees in flower. This year Mrs. Taft is planning to leave Washington the middle of next month for a trip to Mexico. She will visit in Mexico City, and make numerous short trips to other places of interest before returning to the Capital this summer.

Mr. and Mrs. George Rublee, both of whom are Mexico devotees, spent several months in the old capital recently, and the latter brought back with her a rare collection of lovely things which she discovered in the shops there. They resided in the southern republic during the ambassadorship of the late Dwight Morrow, and their return to the city was like a home-coming.

Morrow Avenue.

The sunlit street in Cuernavaca, near Mexico City, where Mr. and Mrs. Morrow had a charming home for week-ending, has been named Dwight Morrow avenue, and Mr. and Mrs. Rublee again visited the sleepy lane that winds through the town captured four centuries ago by Cortes.

Spanish Buildings.

Mrs. Abell writes that the hotel looks like a fairy palace, great white Spanish buildings rising in the midst of the tiny town, remote and peaceful and surrounded by mountains, with only a small white, curving beach stretching out the ocean beyond. She plans to remain there for several weeks before returning to Santa Fe to rejoin her grandmother, Mrs. A. B. Butler, formerly of Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dennis have invited their son and daughter-in-law and their son-in-law and daughter to take a trip through the Panama Canal to California next month. The party will spend some time on the West Coast, probably lingering for a while at Palm Springs, one of the most famous of Western desert resorts. Mr. and Mrs. Wade H. Ellis spent some time there last winter, and are hoping to make the trip again this year, but so far have made no plans.

Mr. Walter Evans Edge, former United States Ambassador to France, who, with Mrs. Edge and their family, had been in Washington for the early winter season, has sailed from New York for a two-week sojourn in Bermuda. Mrs. Edge is in New York with her two sisters-in-law, Mrs. Loyal F. Sewall and Mrs. Arthur Sewall 2d, of Bath, Me. Mrs. Edge will go to Canada today to visit while her husband is on his southern trip.

Vapor Cleanser Gives New Life To Soiled Rugs

By Ruth Anne Davis.

IT TAKES an impartial observer to tell you the truth about your home. You become so used to the furnishings that your judgement loses its balance. Friends who notice how dull and soiled the rugs are looking, and how drab the upholstery are hardly likely to say so. The wise woman takes it for granted her furniture needs a thorough going over every three or four months. She'll take measures against soil, and dust with a wonderful rug and upholstery shampoo which chases away grime in the bat of an eye

It's called a vapor cleanser, although to all appearances it's a liquid. Here's what happens. You dampen your brush with it, shake off the moisture, and then rub the brush over the soiled surface. It's the vapor emanating from the brush that does things to the dirt.

This cleanser is easy to use, and highly satisfactory in every way. One bottle of it will last you for ages.

So Now You Know!

ONE WOMAN surveyed herself sadly in the mirror. I wouldn't be so bad looking, she thought, if only my hair was cut right. She turned, regarding herself on one side and then the other. Her hair was stringy and the wrong length. It was closely shingled in the back, giving her head a clipped naked look.

"If I only knew where to go to have my hair fixed," she sighed. "If only there was some good inexpensive place!"

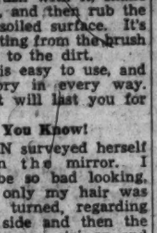
It's too bad this young woman didn't know about the beauty salon where you can have either a hair cut, shampoo, fingerwave, manicure, or practically anything else for only 50 cents. The work is beautifully done, and the place itself one you'll enthuse about.

Deodorant Powder.

LOOKING exactly like an attractive little change purse is the deodorant "puff and pocket" in the notions department of a downtown store. The purse section opens up and inside there's a little puff filled with a soothing deodorant powder. Here's a grand little thing to carry with you wherever you go. The price? Only 25 cents.

Handy Nail Gadget.

KEEPING one's nails groomed isn't always as easy as it sounds. One chief difficulty is the cuticle. It must be trained to stay back. Otherwise it grows forward, obscures the moon of the nail, and frequently dries, breaks off, and results in hangnails. Second difficulty is the nail tip. Women who do their own housework, others who spend hours banging the keys of a typewriter, and still others who play frequently on the piano, find that their nails are prone to break off, flatten and loose their proper shape.



To care for these difficulties there's a little gadget selling in a local store. It's called a nail pencil and it's a three-in-one affair. One end has a rubber tap you use for training the cuticle.

The other end has a little metal blade for cleaning and shaping the tips. This pulls off and underneath there's a nail whitener.

Timepiece Bags.

THERE'S no holding back these new spring bags! They're up to real tricks in one nearby shop. There you'll find them with little timepieces peeping out of an opening in the side.

Pleasant HOMES

By Elizabeth MacRae Boykin.

WHAT WOULD we do with a living room that must be used for dining and bridge? That is the question now perplexing a pretty matron with a husband who has given the word to proceed with some improvements and additions. She can have the walls painted over and can buy new draperies, one new chair and a desk. She must use her old rug, which is an Oriental, predominantly wine color, with blue, and old overstuffed pieces, which are dark red. Another easy chair she plans on having slip covered. The piano, chest, tables and side chairs are of mahogany, but rather nondescript in design. She must keep them, however, and wondered what type of desk would do best with the odds and ends.

Our advice would be to have the walls painted light blue and select the new chair in a deeper blue. The easy chair that she plans to slip cover would be nicest in a figured material with a light ground and a flowered motif. She could use this same material for draperies over white glass curtains. Then we should have all the lamps and accessories in white with a vase or two of lemon yellow, and fresh flowers in yellow whenever possible. A Sheraton or Governor Winthrop style desk would be adaptable, or a Queen Anne kneehole desk.

WAS IT MURDER?

By JAMES HILTON

Author of "Goodbye, Mr. Chips" and "Lost Horizon."

Colin Revell, young writer, visits Robert Roseveare, headmaster of his old school, Oakington, to help solve the mystery of the death of Robert Marshall, younger brother of Wilbraham, head-prefect at the school, and cousin of Mr. Ellington, his housemaster. The boy was found dead in bed, his skull pierced by a gas light fixture that had fallen on him. Roseveare's suspicions were aroused when he found a note written the night before Robert died leaving his belongings "if anything should happen," to his brother Wilbraham. Revell talks with Daggat, the garrulous school padre; Lambourne, one of the masters, and Ellington's young wife, but comes to no conclusions.

CHAPTER VI.

LIKE SOME rather preposterous slow-motion film the pageant of an Oakington Sunday tortuously unwound itself. Revel took tea with the head and dazzingly propounded his pet theory that Charlotte, Emily and Anne Bronte were allotropic personalities of the same human or perhaps inhuman being. The head listened attentively and appeared impressed. In such wise the time passed pleasantly enough until the ringing of the chapel bell for evening service. The Head, it seemed, was not going to attend. "I have some letters to write," he explained. "But you go, most certainly. Supper will be immediately afterwards. We do not dress on Sundays."

In one of the rear pews of the rather ornate chapel, as the school began to stream in, Revell sought to capture the real, genuine, hundred-per-cent thrill of the Old Boy dreaming of past days. He was far more conscious of a thrill, however, when Mrs. Ellington came to sit in the pew beside him. She smiled cordially, and her husband, next to her on the other side, leaned forward with a nod of reluctant recognition. "I wondered if you would be here," she whispered, "and to tell the truth, I rather hoped you wouldn't."

Of course he asked why.

Revell was thoroughly amused. "So I've been told already today."

"Oh yes, by Mr. Lambourne, I know. He said he had met you. He also said you had written a novel. Have you really?"

"England expects," replied Revell, lightly purloining some one else's epigram, "that every young man some day will write a novel."

"But you have, haven't you? Do tell me what it's called—Mr. Lambourne gave me the name, but I'm afraid I've forgotten."

"'Ancient Lights,'" answered Revell, frowning heavily. (Every time he uttered it, it always sounded sillier, but this was the first time he had ever whispered it to his neighbor in a place of worship.)

"'Ancient Rights'?"

"No, 'Lights,'" he enunciated, as loudly as he dared.

Hymn Ends Conversation.

The announcement of the opening hymn put an end to further conversation. She was a fool, he thought, as he sang an intermittent and languishing alto. A charming and attractive little fool, no doubt; but a fool for all that. Yet with a half sideways glance at her dark and sparkling eyes, he felt again the thrill of proximity.

Even apart from his neighbor, he found the chapel service quite interesting, especially as Daggat, within five minutes of beginning his serman, supplied a perfect clue to the mystery of the note in Marshall's algebra book.

He would take as his text, began Daggat, in a mournful monotone, part of the eighteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter of Jeremiah, Jeremiah, twenty-two, eighteen. "They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah my brother! or, Ah sister! They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah Lord or, Ah his glory!" As it was the last Sunday before the vacation, he thought it would not be unfitting to review in retrospect the manifold blessings and trials of the past term. It was a good thing, every now and then, to stop and take a look behind us along the path of life, as it were, and so draw lessons from the past to help us in the future. There had been one happening, at least, within the memory of them all, that had brought them the deepest and most profound sorrow. Into their midst, unlooked for and without warning, there had come the Angel of Death. . . .

"You may remember," went on Daggat, entering upon his second half hour with a preliminary swig of water from the tumbler on the pulpit ledge, "you may, I say, remember words which I addressed to you, here, from this same pulpit, upon the first Sunday of this term. How little did I, or any one of us then imagine that, so shortly afterwards, my words would appear prophetic! And yet it should be a lesson to us—a much needed lesson in this age of boastful science and too confident invention—a lesson to us never to forget, even for a moment, that our health, our happiness, even the very breath of our life, depend, not upon our own puny wills, but upon an all-wise and an all-knowing Proidence. . . ."

Revell almost laughed. He knew that immediately after evening service it was the custom for the whole school to adjourn to the assembly hall and spend 20 minutes, presided over by a master, in writing letters, reading books, or some other silent occupation.

An Invitation Extended.

"Wasn't it awful?" whispered Mrs. Ellington, as they left the pew after the benediction; and she added, without waiting for him to reply: "But it was positively cheerful compared with some that we have had. By the way, how long are you staying?"

He said that he would most likely be returning to London the next morning.

"Don't forget to visit us when you come again," she said with a smile, and Revell, shaking hands, promised accordingly.

During supper with the head he could not resist the temptation to be oracular. "I think I've solved your little mystery, sir," he remarked, after preliminary conversation.

But Roseveare, rather to his surprise, showed no eagerness for him to explain. "Revell," he answered, with slow emphasis, "I'm afraid I owe you an apology. There is no mystery. I sent for you in a moment of nervous prostration. Now, in a more normal condition, I can realize fully what you must have thought of it all. You have disguised your feelings with great politeness, my dear boy, but I can judge of them all the same. And you're right, too. I have allowed myself to be completely foolish, and I apologize to you most sincerely for wasting your time . . . Do help yourself to some more wine."

Revell did so, rather crestfallen. "All the same," he rejoined, "though I quite agree with you that there isn't any real mystery, I do happen to have found a reason—or at least a theory—to explain the note left in Marshall's algebra book. He was, I gather, the sensitive, imaginative type. Now, it so happened that on the first Sunday evening of term, Capt. Daggatt preached a rather doleful sermon—all about sudden death and that sort of thing. I know, because in his sermon tonight he made a great point of recalling what he had said then. Well . . . my theory is that Marshall, overimpressed by it all, went straight away into the hall afterward and wrote out that rather amateurish last will and testament. Don't you think it possible?"

"More than possible—very probable, I should think. But the whole thing is, as I said, too foolish to be worried about."

Revell Feels Injured.

Revell felt a little sore at the manner in which his really brilliant theory had been received. By the morning, however, he had come to the conclusion that Roseveare perhaps did suffer from sudden baseless apprehensions, and after breakfast the two parted with many expressions of mutual esteem. Just at the last moment Roseveare thrust a sealed envelope into his hand. "Don't open it till you get into the train," he said. "Good-by—good-by."

Revell, of course, opened it in the taxi. It contained a check for 10 guineas and a sheet of notepaper on which were written the words "For professional services."

In his private diary (which he vaguely imagined might some day be published in a number of annotated volumes) Revell wrote: "The Oakington incident is closed. It was all quite pointless, as I thought from the beginning, but it ended in fond farewells and a check for 10 guineas, which isn't really so bad. I think I rather like Roseveare, nerves or not; but I didn't greatly care for Ellington. The real Oakington mystery, I should think, is why such an attractive woman as Mrs. Ellington ever married him."

Two Policemen Settle Row Over Baby's Milk

Boston (U.P.).—Neighbors sent a riot call to Roxbury police to quell a disturbance in a house nearby.

Patrolmen Walter Lutz and Jeremiah Crowley responded to the call. They found a husband and wife arguing about the amount of milk to give to their baby.

The officers, who had had plenty of experience with such matters, prescribed the amount and left. Silence prevailed.

Claudia Cranston, Air Tourist, Tells of Experiences at Ceremony Here.

By Dudley Harmon.

DIMINUTIVE Claudia Cranston, who "just kids along" the jungle savages she meets in her travels and then writes books about them, came to Washington this week.

Miss Cranston, her nose pink in the cold January wind which blew across the airport, helped Postmaster General Farley and Gov. Winship, of Puerto Rico, stow on a Southbound plane the first "aviation edition" of a book ever printed. The volume, paper covered and weighing less than a pound, is destined for passengers fed up on the usual airplane literary fare of newspapers and magazines. Hitherto airline officials have considered books too bulky for regular use on planes.

Miss Cranston wrote the book "Sky Gypsies." It is an account of her recent 25,000-mile airplane journey through South America. Over jungles and jagged peaks she flew, from San Juan, Puerto Rico, as far South as Buenos Aires. Altogether she spent 300 hours in the air, without a single accident or forced landing.

CLAUDIA CRANSTON

Miss Cranston had a few words to say on the secret of traveling light. On her journey she managed to compress into the maximum 55 pounds allowed by the airplane company articles ranging all the way from riding boots to costume jewelry.

"Women who fly a great deal," said Miss Cranston, "can get the most out of their baggage allowances by cutting down on toilet articles and by carefully planning each item they will need on the journey. Cold cream is much lighter when carried in tubes than in heavy glass jars. Tortoise shell articles should be left at home. Jewelry can best be carried if pinned inside the pockets of a top coat. Special airplane luggage, which weighs less than the ordinary kind, effects a great saving."

Kidded Savages.

Miss Cranston flew over the Andes, 15,000 feet above sea level, without a tremor. She believes that eating a full meal just before taking off helps prevent air sickness, or, as she puts it, "you'll fly best on a tight belt."

The most exciting moment of Miss Cranston's eventful career came when the car in which she was traveling through the jungle of Haiti broke down, leaving her stranded among some savages who had never seen a white woman before. In no way floored by the incident, Miss Cranston prevailed upon them to do some tom tom dances for her.

"I just kidded them along," she said nonchalantly. "You see, I come from Texas, and am quite used to Negroes."

Among Miss Cranston's other exploits are alligator hunting in the Amazon, which she describes as "great sport."

Most of her writing is done in shorthand notes on the backs of old checks and letters, while traveling.

In a few days Miss Cranston will leave for a 'round-the-world tour, in the course of which she hopes to go to Ethiopia to look over the situation there. In 1937 she plans to fly over Alaska and write a book about her experiences on the trip.

St. Vitus Dance Is Considered Important Childhood Disease

By Dr. Irving S. Cutter.

CHOREA, or St. Vitus dance, was first described accurately by a seventeenth century English physician, Thomas Sydenham, who for a time served as a captain of cavalry in Cromwell's army. It is now known as Sydenham's chorea and is an important disease of childhood.

The disease is characterized by irregular, uncoordinated movements of the muscles of the body and may be first noticed in the face as grimaces or contortions. Afflicted children are accused of "making faces" and the jerking movements may become obvious even before the disease is recognized. St. Vitus dance is found more often in girls than in boys and is rarely seen after the age of 20.

It is difficult, however, to differentiate chorea from hysteria. In each of these conditions the movements may increase when the patient is being examined or is under observation. Involuntary contractions may also appear in the early stage of encephalitis (sleeping sickness).

Hysteria Similar.

More often than not during the development of chorea the mother will relate that the child has been extremely nervous for a few weeks. The patients themselves will first complain of feeling very tired and the muscles will show marked weakness. In other cases the onset is sudden or is preceded by a period in which the child is clumsy, dropping things that she is handling.

On thorough examination some infection can usually be traced and the chief type is closely related to that which causes rheumatism. Some authorities believe the symptoms may be due to a mild form of encephalitis.

The child must be prevented from injuring himself by adequate padding of the metal parts of the bed proper, as well as of the hands and perhaps the head. Precautions against chilling must be taken, and if there is much perspiration the skin must be kept dry. Everything calculated to produce excitement—such as the presence of other children, visitors, etc.—must be eliminated. If the case is severe great difficulty may be encountered in feeding, as the head may jerk so persistently that the child can not feed himself. Occasionally a rubber feeding tube will be required.

Precaution's Needed.

The diet should be largely liquid—fruits, fruit juices and milk. As soon as the temperature disappears eggs, fish, chicken and vegetables may be given. The last thing to add is meat.

A most important point in the treatment of chorea is that the patient shall be kept in bed for weeks beyond the time of apparent recovery. This is desirable because heart damage may occur if the child is permitted to get about before convalescence has been completely established. Even though there is no evidence of inflammation of the lining of the heart (endocarditis) there may be a slight heart enlargement and bed rest is the ideal way to assist Nature to maintain normal heart muscle.

Girl Collegians Turn to Dance As Major Course in Education

MANY of the women students in three leading colleges are abandoning their struggles with philosophy, languages and higher mathematics and turning instead of mastering the intricate motions of the dance. The colleges, which recently declared dancing a major subject are Bennington, in Vermont; Mills, in California, and the University of Wisconsin.

Miss Tina Flade, who performed last evening at the King-Smith Studio Playhouse here, brings this news with her from Mills College, where she is intructor in dancing. Her pupils number well over a hundred. Miss Flade is taking this winter off to make a professional tour of principal cities.

Miss Flade is a German. At one time she was the pupil of Mary Wigman, whose novel, barefoot dancing was widely hailed by the critics when she made her debut a few years ago.

Natural Dancers.

"Americans are naturally a dancing people," said Miss Flade, who, with a shoulder-length bob reminiscent of Alice in Wonderland, does not look old enough to be a full-fledged instructor. "Good professionals are as rare here as they are in other countries, but the average is extraordinarily good.

"The American public is becoming increasingly dance conscious. The fact that dancing has been made a major subject in three colleges is evidence of that. Famous dancers who make tours in this country are playing to packed houses, even in the smallest towns."

Never Too Old.

Miss Flade belongs to the new school which believes that a person is almost never too old to take up dancing. This is directly opposite to the theory of classical, or ballet, dancing, where students start in childhood to do strenuous exercises and learn the complicated steps necessary to a finished performance.

"Mary Wigman did not take up her career until she was 28," said Miss Flade. "I never had any lessons as a child, and I do not take pupils under 16. Of course, women who want to take up dancing must have the requisite strength, as it is a strenuous art, but they need not think themselves too old to begin merely because they did not take it up in childhood."

The general public has only a confused idea of the significance and purpose behind modern dancing, according to Miss Flade. Many look upon it as a queer form of "self expression," in which a dancer waves her arms and strikes strange attitudes to express something hidden from everyone except herself.

TINA FLADE.

False Conceptions.

"This is an entirely false conception," said Miss Flade yesterday. "Only an amateur dances purely for self-expression. The real artist must convey something above himself, a message of some sort. The personal element enters into it somewhat, of course, but dancing is more than just the medium to express one's own personality.

"There are certain rules and fundamental laws underlying modern dancing just as in every other art. However, it differs from the old classical form in that a beginner has an opportunity to make use of whatever imagination and invention she may possess, instead of simply following a number of steps handed down to her by others.

"Every spring my pupils give a recital. "However, since they have not reached the stage where they can call themselves really professional in the art, we call these recitals mere demonstrations of technique, of progress made during the year, rather than dances."

Parents Urged To Encourage Youthful Art

By Alice Clarissa Richmond.

MOST CHILDREN, like primitive man, have an ability to draw, and to draw intelligibly. Generally, however, the ability is never developed and dies from disuse. By the time they try to express themselves in pictures—when they enter art class at school, for example—they have become self-conscious and critical and so lost the knack of artistic creation.

For to put an idea on paper, whether in words or pictures, is creation. In the natural course of development, the picture, the visual image which all can read, precedes the written word, just as picture-writing or hieroglyphic preceded the alphabet.

It is excellent training and a lasting amusement to little children to tell a story in picture form, and if parents would but cultivate the child's own urge to do so, they would find it worth while.

Suppose Sam comes to his mother with the request so often heard, "write me a bear, mummy." "Mummy" has never been able to put two lines together to make anything, and doesn't know how to respond. Any bear she draws brings only the scornful comment, "bears don't look like that!" Let her turn the tables on the child and ask him to "write a bear" or better still, "write me a story of something."

If she is really interested and shows intelligent appreciation of the results, Sam will gladly oblige. All he needs is a large piece of paper and a pencil. There is no need of criticism when he displays his picture. He will soon see its defects and daily improve his artistic conceptions. Meanwhile, he is learning a new and important language, and one which will not only help him in self-expression but also in a keener observation of the world about him.

This BUSINESS of LIVING

By Mary Haworth.

DEAR MISS HAWORTH: It is unfortunate that birth control is argued at such great length on moral grounds, because such argument invariably degenerates into a theological discussion and will not remain in the field of social ethics and economics where it belongs. Obvious indeed, however, is the crime in permitting a minority group through the misuse of an assumed power to prevent people from working out their course of life in their own way so long as it interferes in no degree with that of others.

• • • •

The slowest and hardest work of which men are capable is thinking. To be adequate, thinking must be based for the most part on experience, and unless individual experiences as units of a social group are sufficiently wide and numerous to be useful as reference points for conduct, life has little to offer. As long as the processes of intellection are held in check and made even more difficult by prejudice, ignorance, and superstition, under whatever guise or name, just that long will most of our problems in social ethics remain unsolved.

• • • •

Birth control is not a matter for any sectarian group to forbid; neither is it something upon which the State should issue pronouncements. Until both church and State assume their proportionate share of the social responsibility arising from uncontrolled human propagation, neither should have any voice in preventing the dissemination of reliable and helpful information to those who could and would use it.

• • • •

The answer, as I see it, is to make freely available through properly accredited medical channels whatever is known and accepted regarding birth control and let those who can and will take advantage of it as they wish. This in no way obligates those who believe they should not obtain or use such information to do more than refuse it, but at the same time it does permit those who want it, an opportunity to exercise a free choice in the matter.

• • • •

Race improvement, the elimination of the criminal and unemployable who have become an almost intolerable burden, and the desire for a reasonably rapid and consistent moral, political, and social progress would unquestionably seem to indicate the need for giving those whom the law holds responsible for the family welfare an opportunity to say what those responsibilities shall be. There are, however, as has been said before, none so blind as those who will not see.

Very sincerely. N. S. M.

An Interesting Letter.

DEAR N. S. M.: Yours is an unusually interesting and well-expressed defense of birth control and one, I fell sure, which will meet with the applause of those who believe as you believe. On January 8, and again on January 12, it was suggested here that persons wishing to air their views on the subject of birth control address their communications to the "Letters to the Editor" department. Letters received prior to the time this suggestion was made will be published here as space permits.

Clubwoman, 90, Tells Progress Of Federation

Oldest Member, Who Joined First Club in 1877, Says Scope Is Widened.

NINETY-YEAR-OLD Mrs. Lucretia Blankenburg, a club woman since 1877, says that women's clubs have come a long way from early days when members read papers on obscure literary figures whose lives they laboriously looked up in the encyclopedia.

Mrs. Blankenburg.

Mrs. Blankenburg, a resident of Philadelphia, is in Washington this week to attend the mid-winter meeting of the board of directors of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. She is the federation's oldest member.

"When I joined my first women's club almost sixty years ago," she reminisced, "members avoided all questions of a controversial nature. No one dreamed of talking politics or economics. Instead, they read 'literary' papers, the material of which they found not in experience, but in books.

"But today, with the exception of religion and party politics, we discuss all subjects, ranging from gardening to government. I recently gave a report on the condition of underprivileged children throughout the country. Another member has completed a study of our national resources."

Wanted to Learn.

Mrs. Blankenburg joined her first club not for social, but for educational, reasons. She has learned a great deal from club work, and even at 90 is, to use her own words, "still learning." She is glad that club women have enlarged their scope of activities to the extent they have in the years since 1877.

Federation members have shown their appreciation of Mrs. Blankenburg's years of effort in behalf of women's clubs by making her honorary vice president of their organization. But she is not content to sit back and do nothing. She is at present a member of the research committee engaged in looking up historical facts for the use of federation members.

Fresh Fruit Needed in Winter Diet to Bring Sparkle to the Eyes and Zest to the Appetite

Doctors Stress Medical Value Of Tart Juices

Markets Show Spring Signs as Strawberries and Rhubarb Arrive.

By Dorothea Duncan.

D. DUNCAN.

HAVE your eyes lost their sparkle? Are you feeling let down and more or less the worse for a hectic Christmas round of turkey dinners? Is your appetite dull? Then why not try the best mid-winter tonic in the world—acquire the fruit habit.

Many of us feel that winter is the time for hot foods, lots of meat and potatoes, casserole dishes of macaroni and cheese, griddle cakes and sausages for breakfast. Doctors and food authorities tell us that we must have more protein foods so that our bodies may be kept in constant repair. We need more energy giving foods, too, starches and sugars to keep our bodies warm on the damp, chilly Washington days. Of course, we do. But while we remember this advice, we overlook the fact that these same food authorities recommend a plentiful supply of fresh fruits and vegetables in our list.

Health Investment.

Vegetables naturally seem to be part of our meals. We serve them everyday as an accompaniment to the dinner meat course, but we forget about fruits.

Fruits, though they are more expensive than the energy giving foods, supply the sparkle to our meals. They give us many of our most important vitamins and minerals, all but three—namely, prunes, plums and cranberries—keep us on the alkaline side, or to express it more clearly produce an alkaline reaction in the body, which helps us to ward off dreaded winter colds and infections. Any money spent for fruit more than repays us in good health.

Few fruits are any longer termed seasonal, for modern refrigeration and fast transportation makes it possible to have almost any kind of fruit the entire year round. It used to be a great event at Christmas to find an orange in the toe of your stocking, but now we have an abundant supply of oranges and they are particularly plentiful and inexpensive in the winter months, when we need them the most. There are small oranges for juice, and large seedless ones for slicing and segmenting. Oranges have become our favorite breakfast fruit. If appetites become fickle, however, there is always a great variety of other fruits obtainable. For those who like the citrus fruit bracer the best, there are grapefruit in abundance. In the last couple of years Texas has become known for the delicate flavored, pink meated grapefruit that she supplies. Tangerines, lemons and limes wind up the selection of citrus fruits.

Signs of Spring.

The fruit markets this week-end are showig signs of spring, for slender pink stalks of rhubarb have been sent into Washington from Florida. Strawberries, too, are making their initial appearance. A strawberry and rhubarb pie—made with a crisscross top—will make everyone at the table forget gray skies and the weatherman's forecast of more winter weather to come. Rhubarb and orange sauce will put lagging appetites in fine form if served before griddle cakes and bacon strips one of these chilly mornings. Plain rhubarb sauce and sugar cookies taste good at luncheon to the school age youngsters.

Then we always find our old favorites in a plentiful supply—the golden banana and the ruddy apple. Bananas are becoming more and more a part of the American menu. We serve them with dry cereal sugar and cream for breakfast as we always have, but housewives have discovered numerous other intriguing uses for them. The children like them mashed through a sieve and added to milk, making a delightful beverage for luncheon.

Everyone likes them baked in the skin and served with lemon juice and a little sugar. Baked in this simple way they may be served with meat in place of one vegetable or served for dessert. Banana shortcake, prepared just like the strawberry version using bananas in place of the berries, makes an enticing dessert for winter menus. Bananas wrapped in bacon and broiled are a delicious main luncheon dish.

Coconuts Too.

Other fresh winter fruits include grapes, pineapple, persimmons, cranberries, pears and coconut. The last mentioned, though sometimes considered a fruit, has few if any of the characteristics of the other fruits mentioned, but it is included here because it can be used in many attractive fruit combinations.

Fresh fruit is not the only possible fruit source for winter menus. Canned and dried fruits also have their place. Some fresh fruits are desirable, of course, but when it is not always possible to include a fresh fruit in our menu, we can turn to one of the many canned or dried varieties.

Fresh fruit is often preferred to any other kind for breakfast because it is tart and whets the appetite. Dried fruits and canned fruits are somewhat sweeter and, for some persons, satisfy the appetite to the extent no further breakfast is appealing.

Acquire the Fruit Habit—Especially Important in Winter

Winter never comes to the fruit market any more. Here we have as elaborate an array of fresh fruits as in the summer months. Newest of arrivals from Florida's sunny fields are the pink stalks of rhubarb and red-ripe strawberries. D'Anjou and Bosc pears, yellow and red Delicious and Winesap apples, grapefruit, both the pink-meated ones from Texas, or the pale yellow ones from other fields, oranges, bananas, coconuts and persimmons add sparkle to our winter menu.

Cranberries Are Excellent For Mousse

Everybody likes cranberries. They like them whole, and they like them strained. And many delight in cranberry and orange relish. But the recipe given here is an even newer and grander way of serving this popular fruit.

Cranberry mousse, prepared with evaporated milk, retains all the marvelous tanginess of the berries, and adds the smooth, creamy richness of the milk. Nothing could be easier to make. If the cranberry jelly is ready in advance, there's no trick at all to combining the ingredients. The mixture will freeze in an hour to an hour and a half.

Cranberry Mousse.

2½ cups raw cranberries measured after sorting
1¼ cups cold water
1¼ cups sugar
1 cup evaporated milk
2 teaspoons lemon jice
¼ cup orange juice

Wash cranberries, add cold water and cook slowly until soft, about 15 minutes. Press through a potato ricer or sieve. There should be 1¾ cups pulp. Add sugar and boil 10 minutes. There should be 1¼ cups jelly. Chill milk thoroughly. Whip until stiff. Add lemon juice and continue whipping until very stiff. Cut and fold in the cold cranberry pulp and orange juice, lightly but thoroughly. Pour into cold freezing tray of an automatic refrigerator and freeze. Or pour into a mold and pack in 1:3 salt-ice mixture. Yield 6 servings.

One of the nicest things to be done with the mousse is freezing it in cubes in the refrigerator tray. The colorful squares are a perfect accompaniment to the meat course. Or the cubes may be served on a lettuce leaf, as a salad, or without other adornment, as a sparkling dessert.

LET'S make tomorrow's breakfast the most exciting one of the month. To start with, we will have hot grapefruit instead of cold. Does it sound attractive? Of course not, at first thought, but after you read on and find out the whole story it will seem more appealing and when you have finally eaten the hot fruit you will want to serve it again and again.

First, prepare the fruit as you always do. Cut each grapefruit in half, remove the seeds and the heart and loosen the segments with a sharp knife. Then sprinkle each half with granulated sugar, but not to the point of saturation. Have ready a small glass of currant jelly which has been melted in a little boiling water, and pour this over the fruit.

Tuck the grapefruit halves under the broiler not too close to the flame, and when the fruit is hot and the sugar brown and crusty, remove it from the broiler and serve at once. The flavor is something to talk about.

Ginberbread, Too.

You will be surprised again when you hear what makes an excellent accompaniment for the hot grapefruit—gingerbread served with lots of butter. Make the gingerbread up fresh for breakfast, or if you happen to have had gingerbread the night before for dinner save the leftover portion and reheat it for breakfast.

If you slice the gingerbread in pieces about threequarters of an inch wide they will heat without drying out. The gingerbread may be tucked under the broiler for just a few minutes after the grapefruit has been removed. Let it heat but not brown on one side and then turn until the other side is warm.

The heat will release the moisture in the bread making it as soft as when freshly baked. Remove it from the oven before it has a chance to dry out. Serve with plenty of butter.

Coffee, Tea or Cocoa.

Either coffee or tea is excellent with this grapefruit and gingerbread combination. Cocoa makes a grand beverage to serve with the same breakfast for the children.

If you want a heavier breakfast than the one suggested, why not serve an eggnog?

Flavor the ones for the adult with a little sugar and coffee and the ones for the youngsters with chocolate sirup, a little vanilla and sugar, a bit of orange juice, or dry cocoa and sugar beaten into the egg. Allow one egg for each tall glass of milk. Serve cold and add cracked ice if desired.

Many Hams Do Not Need To Be Boiled

MANY of the commercially prepared smoked hams need no soaking or parboiling before they are baked. All the preliminary preparation for this type of ham (each brand called by some special name) is to remove the wrapping and wash the ham with a damp cloth. The rind is not removed.

The next time you buy a ham plan to have one that can be prepared without the fuss of soaking and parboiling. For a real treat bake it and serve with cinnamon orange slices.

Place the hole ham in an open roasting or baking pan fat side up. Place in a 300-degree F. (slow) oven. Bake without covering, allowing 25 minutes to the pound. Forty-five minutes before the ham is done, remove from oven and take off the rind, which will be brittle and easily removed. Pour off the fat in the pan. Make a paste of 1 cup of brown sugar, juice of 1 orange and grated rind of 1 orange and spread over the surface. Complete the baking in the same low oven. Serve garnished with cinnamon orange slices and watercress or parsley.

Make a sirup of 1½ cups sugar, 1½ cup water, juice of 1 lemon and 2 sticks cinnamon. Wash 3 oranges and cut in thick slices. Place in hot sirup and boil gently without covering, until orange rind is clear. Place a 1 inch length of stick cinnamon through the center of each orange slice. Chill the oranges in the sirup before serving.

Varied Colors Key to Charm In Decorating

Smart Table Settings May Either Contrast or Harmonize.

COLOR is running rampant these days. The more colors you can bring together in a harmonious combination, the smarter you are, whether it be in decorating interiors, costumes or table settings.

Dishes need no longer match, but they must contrast or harmonize, to be in good taste and to be really effective. Many women stick to one China pattern for the main dishes, but use salad and dessert plates of another color or pattern. With a main service of flowery design, for example, plain colored salad plates and dessert plates may be used. The plain color should be a contrasting one, or a matching one for the most prominent color displayed in the flowery pattern used for the rest of the meal. The dishes may be of glassware as well as china. If of glass, the water tumblers should also match the odd plates.

Many women find plain colored dishes effective, especially if two tones of the same color are used, or perhaps a vivid and a deeper color. Brilliant orange and deep mellow golden brown dishes make an effective combination as do aqua-blue and brown, yellow and green, white and red.

The gayer the dishes, the simpler the cloth, is a good rule to follow if you wish to create a very charming table arrangement. Use dainty linens, or fine lace or embroidery patterns with fine china and glassware. Use heavier linens with the dashing pottery ware. Plain cloths, too, are better with brilliantly splashed dishes. Some of the white linens with bold colored borders are especially good with the colored dishes, if the color in the cloth matches or harmonizes with the dishes to be used.

Silver, too, must be correctly chosen if your table is to be perfect to the last detail. Dainty patterns go with fine glassware, china and linen. The floral designs, especially the heavier ones, should be kept for the finer but plainer accessories, while the flat sterling or paste, or the stainless steel knives and forks with colored handles, should be used with the heavier pottery ware, rough linens and rustic or peasant accessories.

The center table decorstion, too, must be in keeping with the rest of, the table accessories. Dainty flowers, sheer crystal bowls, silver vases and mirror plaques all belong to the more exquisite linens, china and silverware; while the bowls of wood or pottery, the sturdier flowers and the vegetable centerpieces are in keeping with the brighter, more dashing table arrangement.

D'Anjou Pears.

D'Anjou pears, now available in the markets, are a delicious breakfast fruit either raw or baked with sugar, water, lemon juice and a little grated lemon rind. Orange juice and grated rind may be used in place of the lemon.

Oyster Appetizers.

Large, fresh oysters, wrapped in bacon which is held in place with small skewers, may be broiled under the flame and served on small rounds of hot buttered toast to provide an appetite-whetting first course. Garnish with sprigs of parsley and sliced stuffed olives.

Vegetable Platter On Table Is Best

Cauliflower Thought Best in Combination.

INSTEAD of serving your next vegetable dinner on individual plates fixed in the kitchen, let the host serve the plates at the table from one large platter of vegetables.

An interesting combination of vegetables for this type of service begins with a perfect head of cauliflower which has been cooked whole in boiling salted water, drained and placed in the center of a large serving platter. The cauliflower should be topped with golden hollandiase and surrounded with a medley of vividly colored vegetables. Circle the cauliflower with a ring of spinach nests and fill each nest with bright buttered carrot discs. Surround this with a border of mashed potatoes which have been piped on the platter in a zig-zag pattern with a pastry tube. Brush the potatoes with melted butter and dash with paprika.

You will find that it takes less time to arrange one large platter effectively than three or four, or five or six. Then, too, when you arrange all the vegetables quickly on the one platter there is less opportunity of their getting cold, as often happens when you must fix several platters on a smaller scale. The large platter of vegetables as it greets the eye is just as effective as the individual vegetable plates.

Half-alive from One to Five?

It's EASY to see when another man is slipping. But it's harder to face it yourself. So it was with Jim. For months, he vaguely realized something was wrong with him. Tasks that he used to take in his stride had become a grind. He dreaded the afternoon hours most. Minutes dragged. Sometimes he felt too tired to get through the day. And worst of all, it showed in his work.

Sluggish days are often due to common constipation. It has helped to sidetrack many a promising career. It is a great enemy of vigor. Your pace slows down.

Most frequently, common constipation results from meals that lack sufficient "bulk" to exercise the intestines. So many people make the mistake of dosing themselves with pills and drugs that often do more harm than good. The real answer is to get "bulk" back in your diet. Scientific tests show that Kellogg's ALL-BRAN supplies soft "bulk." Also that this "bulk" is often more effective than the "bulk" in fruits and vegetables. This natural laxative food has been used with success by millions of people. Two tablespoonfuls daily are usually sufficient. Stubborn cases may require ALL-BRAN oftener. If not relieved this way, see your doctor.

Enjoy ALL-BRAN as a cereal, with milk or cream. Sprinkle over other cereals, soups, or salads. Have your wife cook ALL-BRAN into muffins, breads, waffles, etc. Remember, it furnishes wholesome "bulk." And also vitamin B and iron.

Kellogg's ALL-BRAN corrects only common constipation, makes no claim to be a "cure-all." It is much more effective than part-bran products. Sold by all grocers. Made by Kellogg in Battle Creek, Michigan.

A Host of Delightful Breads May Be Made by Varying the Basic Recipe for Biscuits

Quick Breads Provide Variety At Little Cost and Less Work

Scones, Cinnamon Rolls, Coffee-Cake and a Host of Others Are Made From Basic Recipe; Batters and Doughs Must Be Handled Lightly and Demand Quick, Hot Oven.

EVERY woman who wants to make her menus as attractive as possible at little cost and less work should acquire the quick bread habit. These breads, which can be tossed together in a few minutes and baked in almost as short a time, need no yeast or long rising, but depend upon a combination of ingredients, which include baking powder and sweet milk, or baking soda and buttermilk, sour cream or milk for their levening power. Eggs, too, in many of the quick breads, supply levening power.

There are a few important rules to remember when handling all classes of quick breads. These batters and doughs must be handled as lightly and as quickly as possible. They demand a hot oven and most of them should be baked directly after mixing.

The woman who can turn out a fluffy biscuit has mastered the art of one of the most versatile of recipes, for many of the fancier quick breads use the basic biscuit recipe. Scones, cinnamon rolls and quick coffee cake, for example, are merely plain biscuit dough dressed up with a few fancy frills. Often a little more shortening, a bit of sugar and an egg or two are added to the dough to give it a pale creamy color and an added richness and flavor.

Favorite Breakfast Bread.

This dough instead of being baked in small rounds like the usual biscuit, may be baked in a round layer cake tin with a topping of melted butter and sugar and cinnamon crumbs. Thus we have one of America's favorite breakfast breads, the quick coffee cake. Or the dough with its added ingredients may be rolled in an oblong sheet, spread with melted butter, sprinkled with brown sugar and cinnamon and nut meats or raisins, and find itself rolled up like a jelly roll. The roll is in turn cut into half-inch slices which are turned cut side up in a rind pan or laid side by side in a square or round pan. The surface of the pan has been previously buttered and sugared or filled to a depth of about half an inch with a brown sugar sirup.

When the rolls emerge from the oven they are turned out of the pan and served upside down with the glazed brown sugar side upward. These are delicious with afternoon tea or coffee, for breakfast, for Sunday night supper with salads, or with fruit for dessert.

Try the quick coffee cake below for tomorrow's breakfast. The sweet fragrance from the oven is more effective than any alarm clock in dragging late sleepers down to breakfast on time.

Quick Coffee Cake.

2 cups sifted flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
1 egg, well beaten
1½ tablespoons melted butter
1 tablespoon flour
¾ tablespoon salt
6 tablespoons butter or other shortening
½ cup milk
4 tablespoons sugar
½ teaspoon cinnamon

Sift flour once, measure, add baking powder, salt and sugar, and sift again. Cut in shortening. Combine egg and milk; add to flour mixture, stirring until mixture is blended. Turn into greased nine-inch layer pan, spreading dough evenly. Brush top with melted butter. Mix together sugar, flour and cinnamon for topping and sift mixture evenly with dough. Bake in a hot oven (400 degrees F.) 25 to 30 minutes. Cut in wedges while in pan and remove pieces separately.

Muffins Important.

Muffins fill just as an important place in adding variety to your menus as biscuit mixtures for like biscuits the basic recipe may be used for many attractive variations. Sometimes just the substitution of a different kind of flour for half the wheat flour of the original recipe makes an interesting change from the original recipe. Fresh berries, drained of all moisture, and rolled in a bit of the flour reserved from the amount used in the recipe may be added to the plain muffin batter. Chopped dried fruits treated in the same way also offer pleasant variations.

Chopped crystalized fruit peel or nuts make two other variations. Jam or marmalade centers will also tempt the appetite. Keep the following basic muffin recipe among your favorite recipes, for you will find that you will be turning to it time and time again as the basis for many delightful quick breads.

Muffin Recipe.

2 cups sifted flour
4 teaspons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
4 tablespoons melted butter or other shortening
2 tablespoons sugar
1 egg, well beaten
1 cup milk

Sift flour once, measure, add baking powder, sugar and salt, and sift again. Combine egg, milk and shortening. Add to flour, beating only once enough to dampen all flour. Do not attempt to beat the mixture until smooth, but as soon as all flour is moistened, turn into greased muffin pan. Bake in a hot oven (425 degrees F.) 25 minutes, or until done. Makes 12 muffins. Muffin pans of different materials are suitable. Cast iron pans give an unusually even crust. They should first be heated and greased so the baking of the muffin mixture may not be retarded by the slow heating of the iron pans.

Of all the quick breads that are baked as a loaf or in a sheet, Sally Lunn is perhaps the easiest to make. Its delicate flavor makes it a general favorite. It is particularly nice with a dessertless meal, for it is a little richer than the usual quick bread and tastes somewhat like cake. It should be broken with a fork rather than cut.

Sally Lunn.

½ cup shortening
¼ cup sugar
4 teaspoons baking powder
2 cups flour
1 cup milk
1 egg

Cream the shortening with the sugar. Mix and sift together the flour and baking powder and add to the creamed mixture, alternating with the milk. Add the beaten egg and bake in a loaf or in muffin pans, in a moderate oven (350 degrees to 400 degrees F.).

When fresh huckleberries are in season, one cup stirred in just before baking will be an agreeable addition.

Fresh Shrimp in Bacon Is Popular Appetizer

The increase in the use of hors d'oeuvres, which has occurred in the last two years, has been a boon to the housewife who seeks new and easy ways of making meals distinctive.

An unusual appetizer which is very popular just now is fresh shrimp, wrapped in bacon, and broiled rapidly. No one has found out yet how many of these a guest can eat. They are extremely popular, however, so be sure to have a great supply when you serve them.

Cabbage Is Novel Appetizer Holder

You have seen the smart hors d'oeuvre trays displayed in the stores. Almost everyone carries a plump little object bristling with colored toothpicks.

With a tray, some colored toothpicks and a perfectly shaped head of white or red cabbage, you can create quite as smart an effect. Place the cabbage on a lace paper doilie in the middle of your tray. Stuff it full of toothpicks and top the free points of the toothpicks with small appetizers, olives, pickled onions, burr pickles, etc.

A polished red apple, or a smooth skinned orange or grapefruit or perhaps a prickly fresh pineapple will also make an attractive centerpiece for your hors d'oeuvre tray.

3 Sandwiches Men Will Like

Tips for the Hostess Whose Husband Brings His Poker Club Home.

HERE are three sandwiches that will find favor with men. The next time your husband has his poker club at your house, make the matter of refreshments a simple one for you and an enjoyable one for the guests. Serve a platter of the following sandwiches and plenty of steaming coffee.

For the first, spread slices of rye bread with butter and then with Liederkranz cheese. Cover cheese with a thin layer of catsup. Cover with another slice of buttered bread. Garnish with stuffed olives.

The second sandwich is filled with a nippy cheddar that has been allowed to stand at room temperature until softened. Blend finely chopped salted peanuts and finely chopped parsley with the cheese. Spread on slices of buttered bread. Cover with another slice of buttered bread.

Pimento cheese and bacon make the last of the three, and white or whole wheat bread may be used. Cover sliced of buttered bread with a thin slice of pimento cheese. On each slice place three strips of crisp bacon, and top with another slice of buttered bread. Garnish with mustard pickles. Serve this sandwich immediately while the bacon is hot.

Bitter Chocolate Use.

Chili Con Carne With Plenty of Meat and Beans Is Suggested for Supper.

MONOTONY is the greatest weakness of many menus. It is very easy for a woman, no matter how well she cooks and serves her meals, to get into the habit of serving the same dishes time after time. Then, too, she may have a well-selected series of menus for one week, but the next week she may forget and use the same group of menus on the same days that they were served during the past week. There is nothing that will kill the popularity of a dish more quickly than having your family associate it with a special day in the week.

Sunday night suppers also suffer from monotony. In trying to bring variety into your menus then, why not begin with tomorrow's evening meal and instead of making it a purely American affair let a little foreign flavor creep in?

Chili con carne makes a fine main dish for January. Chili with meat, chili referring to the red pepper so very popular in Mexican cooking. Most of us think of chili con carne as meaning a tomato mixture with red beans or frijoles, and if the description were to be literal it would have to say "chili con carne con frijoles," or chili with meat and beans. However, through popular usage most persons know what is meant. There is on the market the plain chili without beans and the chili with beans. Both are excellent, in fact, it is sometimes a good idea to mix them, giving more meat in the finished dish.

Cheese is good added to the chili con carne. To try it, empty several cans of the chili con carne into a casserole, with possibly some extra canned beef, and mix with layers of grated cheese, and spread cheese over the top. It is delicious and makes a filling dish, one which makes the cold night seem less bleak and lonesome. Set it in a moderate oven (350 degrees F.) to heat through thoroughly.

Some good old-fashioned cole slaw would taste good with the chili, along with some crunchy hard rolls, or better yet, some toasted French bread, spread first with a bit of garlic and plenty of butter.

Finish the supper with some cool, refreshing fruit, a can of your home prepared peaches or plums, perhaps, or a chilled orange ambrosia. Red raspberries, purchasable in the can and chilled thoroughly, will also taste good after the meal of chili and cole slaw.

Plenty of hot coffee or tea all the time for adults and hot cocoa for the children will be appreciated.

This type of supper can be prepared in advance and heated the last minute. It is also economical and a change from the regular fare.

Cheese Is Rich In Elements Needed in Diet

500 Varieties Offer Endless Possibilities; Roquefort Has Tempting Tang.

THESE days of necessary Houdini proclivities in balancing budgets as well as diets, the housewife should put on her cheese thinking-cap and refresh her memory on the fact that, economically and gastronomically speaking, cheese should be numbered among her food "staples." 'Tis true that cheese, like caviar, is a delicacy, but unlike delicacies, it is also a staple food. Therefore, it should not be listed as a delicacy, unessential to the diet, for it is a rich source of both protein and fat, as well as vitamins and minerals.

To give ordinary food a real pick-up, Roquefort cheese, with its salty, dry-cheese flavor, lends a tempting tang. A small lump crumbled into the French dressing which is to be served with a crisp bunch of greens gives the salad true distinction of flavor and adds to its nourishing qualities as well. The delicate blue veins of flavor that run through Roquefort also blend delightfully with meat, fish, vegetables and fruit, to say nothing at all about the possibilities it has in Rosuefort cheese:

Lima Beans and Roquefort.

1 quart milk
½ pound Roquefort
Butter, bread crumbs
Parboil beans, drain; into an oven-ized dish that has been buttered, put a layer of beans, then cheese and continue layers until dish is full. Add salt and pepper and paprika to taste. Add milk, then bread crumbs, and dot with butter. Bake 35 to 45 minutes in a moderate oven. This amount will serve 24 and is an excellent, inexpensive dish for the group lunch meeting at the club.

Leaders Held Success Key Of Crime Unit

King, Dr. White, Others Approve Justice Commission Here.

Comments yesterday on the proposal to establish a District crime commission centered, in most instances, on the necessity of marshalling competent personnel to carry out the idea successfully.

This factor was emphasized by the majority of citizens and officials who were asked for expressions of opinion on plans, now being carried forward, to set up a criminal justice organization in the Capital.

"The value of such a commission depends to a great degree on its personnel," said Dr. William A. White, superintendent of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, nationally known psychiatrist. "I am all for the scientific study of crime from all angles. Scapegoat of society, the criminal is not getting the benefits of scientific research.

"An enormous amount remains to be learned about the crime problem. But the study must be entrusted to people who have something more than simply good intentions."

Illness of Mrs. White prevented the Superintendent from attending the civic subscription dinner at the Mayflower Thursday night, when the commission plan was discussed by Newton D. Baker, president of the Cleveland Association for Criminal Justice; James M. Hepbron, managing director of the Baltimore Criminal Justice Commission, and Justin Miller, chairman of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee on Crime.

Crime Commission.

Senator William H. King, chairman of the Senate District Committee: "The meeting was very interesting and added a great deal to my store of information on the subject. The crime commisson has great possibilities if properly handled. If it gets into the hands of hysterical persons, it will accomplisch nothing."

"I was favorably impressed with last night's meeting," said H. Winship Wheatly, president of the District Bar Association. "I believe that the success of the commission wil ldepend upon the character of its employes. The situation can be worked out favorably, I am sure."

Maj. Ernest W. Brown, superintendent of police, said he is "neutral" as to whether a crime body should or should not be formed.

"But if a helpful program can be developed, I'm all for it. Great care in the selection of personnel probably would determine whether the commission stands or falls," Maj. Brown declared.

William E. Taylor, acting dean of Howard University law school, said: "I think the commission plan is a fine one if you get the right people behind it. Its activities would lower the Washington crime rate, which deserves serious study."

Delighted With Discussion.

Representative Jennings Randolph (Democrat), West Virginia, chairman of the District crime investigating sub-committee, was delighted with hursday's discussions.

"It was the most representative gathering of those most deeply interested in the continued improvement of the District of Columbia," he declared. "It brought together those leaders who I am certain will consolidate their efforts toward the formation of a prominent body to assist in bringing about improved conditions in the District.

"There is real opportunity for cooperative efforts, which should make Washington a leader in the national movement for cities to meet adequately the crime problem. I congratulate those who unselfishly are working toward this end. It is a crystalization of one of the major recommendations of our sub-committee on crime."

Chairman Mary T. Norton, of the House District Committee, said:

"I feel that the dinner last night was a direct result of the crime investigation conducted last year by our sub-committee. Those present appeared very much interested in the problem and indicated a desire to accomplish something worthwhile.

"I believe Washington is well on the way to have a valuable crime commission and I am gratified that our committee had a hand in beginning it."

D. C. Idle Snag Shad As Ban Is Overlooked

Fisherman Busy With Start of Two-Week Running Season.

Under what will soon be the shade of the Japanese cherry blossoms around the Tidal Basin, Washington's unemployed and needy yesterday enjoyed the sport of snagging shad.

With just the beginning of a two-week peak of shad running in sight—they come up the river to spawn—hundreds of Washington's idle hauled out their lines, three-pronged hooks and bamboo poles to take advantage of what is termed an "overlooking of regulations."

According to a National Capital Parks regulation no fishing is permitted from January 1 to June 1. This ruling is imposed to protect seeded ground bordering the Basin. Since 1931 park officials have allowed winter fishing by unemployed and needy around Outlet Bridge and the Tidal Basin boat house.

When one of the fishermen could be stopped long enough to answer a few questions as to what he was going to do with the fish he replied—"eat 'em."

If you are interested in his recipe here it is: First cut off the head and remove the backbone. Soak the rest in salt water over night, roll in cornmeal and fry to a crisp brown. Something a little easier was suggested by another of the fishermen. He said, "I just cut off the head, grind them up into a hash and bake in the oven."

First District Laws Of Session Enacted

Three minor bills were enacted into law yesterday upon being signed by President Roosevelt. They are the first District laws to come out of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

One of the acts authorizes the District health officer to issue permits for reopening of graves if death is caused by certain contagious diseases, while the other two grant healing art licenses to Dr. Pak Chue Chan and Dr. Ronald A. Cox.

All three bills were passed by the House Monday and by the Senate last session.

Citizens Urge Device to Curb Speed of Autos

The Takoma Park Citizens Association last night adopted a resolution requesting the Maryland State Legislature to study the possibility of mechanically regulating the speed of automobiles.

The resolution stated that the campaign for education of drivers and more rigid inspection of autos had failed to reduce accidents. It is the association's belief mechanical governors on cars would be the only way to curb excessive speed and resultant accidents.

In another resolution the group assailed traffic congestion on Seventh street between Pennsylvania avenue and Florida avenue. The traffic director was asked to put in force the same regulations now in effect on downtown F street. It was said congestion on Seventh street causes great delays in street cars.

Two other resolutions opposed legalization of horse racing in the District and urged enactment of more stringent anti-gaming laws.

The group expressed itself in favor of a farm for rehabilitation of chronic alcoholics as proposed by Commissioner Hazen.

Byron M. Coon, in whose father's home the association held its first meeting nearly 50 years ago, was elected to membership.

Citizens Oppose Referenda.

The Glover Park Citizens Association last night went on record against the proposal of Commissioner George E. Allen to permit residents to vote in advisory referenda.

The association gave two reasons for its adverse opinion. First it cited the expense of holding referenda, and second, the belief the Commissioner may learn the true wishes of the people of the District through the Federation of Citizens Associations.

In another resolution the group opposed admission of professional or trade groups into the federation.

Housing Cost, Needs Topic Of First Lady

Mrs. Roosevelt Urges Women to Display More Interest.

Talks to Federation of Clubs at Meeting in the Mayflower.

Women should take a greater interest in improving American housing conditions, Mrs. Roosevelt told the General Federation of Women's Clubs last night at the Mayflower Hotel.

"The Government," she said, "will have to take much responsibility for very low cost housing, but more and more our industrial leaders are going to take greater interest in not only the material success of the country but in social conditions under which people live."

She added it "must be brought within the bounds of possibility" for families with incomes of from $1,000 to $2,000 a year to own their own homes.

Young people, she said, are displaying "an ardent desire" to promote peace. She also praised efforts now under way to increase the buying power of 34,000,000 people who live in towns of less than 10,000 population.

Will Honor Senator Clark.

The federation earlier took official notice of the part Senator Bennett Champ Clark (Democrat), of Missouri, played in the munitions investigations by announcing that he will soon be presented with Missouri's Book of Peace.

The book contains 40,000 signatures to the statement, "We demand that profit be taken out of wark making." Announcement of its award to Senator Clark was made yesterday afternoon at the federation's board meeting by Miss Alves Long, of St. Louis, the federation's chairman of international relations.

The 1936 Presidential campaign, social security legislation, and the United States' stand on neutrality were discussed before the directors by Representative Josh Lee (Democrat), of Oklahoma; Dr. Charles G. Fenwick, professor of political science at Bryn Mawr, and Mrs. William Brown Meloney, editor of the magazine, This Week.

Mrs. Meloney warned her listeners that mud slinging would probably descend to new depths in the coming Presidential campaign. "There may not be any more mud," she said, "but science, which has destroyed the limitations of space, will carry the mud farther than ever before. The cracker barrel circle has widened from six to six million."

Sees Neutrality Bills Inadequate.

Dr. Fenwick, in discussing neutrality policies, termed the pending neutrality bills "half-way measures" and said he believed they would do far more harm than good as they would "practically force the League of Nations to resort to military sanctions or else abandon all effort to bring pressure to bear upon the aggressor."

Representative Lee advocated making permanent the non-intervention policy established by President Roosevelt on the subject of neutrality.

The federation's chairman of public welfare, Mrs. Clarence Fraim, gave the organization's stamp of approval to the social security act by calling it "the most comprehensive public welfare measure ever enacted into law by Congress and probably the greatest peace time taxing measure ever passed by any country in the world."

Two Hine Junior High School pupils, who disappeared from their homes here October 8, were reported located in Miami, Fla., the Women's Bureau said yesterday. They are Ursula Bianco, 15, 327 Ninth street southeast, and Margaret Morris, 14, of 719 Minnesota avenue northeast.

Altered Court For Juveniles Asked in Bill

Mrs. Norton Introduces Measure to End Criminal Phase.

Local Representation in Congress Sought in Resolution.

A bill to alter the character of the District Juvenile Court, changing it from a criminal to a chancery tribunal, was introduced in the House late yesterday by Chairman Mary T. Norton, of the House District Committee. She also reintroduced the joint resolution for District representation in Congress.

The Juvenile Court measure will be the subject of an early public hearing before the Judiciary subcommittee, and a lively battle is anticipated. Hearings will be asked of the House Judiciary Committee for the record bill.

Backed by the League of Women Voters and indorsed by the District Bar Association, the Juvenile Court bill is the outgrowth of a movement extending over several years. It is said to be in line with juvenile courts in more progressive cities throughout the country.

All children under 18 years of age, charged with certain offenses, are subject to the jurisdiction of the court as prescribed in the bill.

"The court may conduct the hearing in an informal manner, and may adjourn the hearing from time to time," the bill states. "All cases involving children shall be heard separately and apart from the trial of cases against adults. The court shall hear and determine all cases of children without a jury."

Courses Open.

Three major courses are open to the court if a child is found to come within the provisions of the act. The court may place the child on probation. It may commit the child to an institution, or it may make such further disposition as it may deem best.

"No adjudication upon the status of any child in the jurisdiction of the court shall operate to impose any of the civil disabilities ordinarily imposed by conviction," the bill reads, "nor shall any child be deemed a criminal by reason of such adjudication, nor shall such adjudication be deemed a conviction of any crime."

The Juvenile Court record of a child cannot be introduced as evidence against any child in another court proceeding, nor can it operate to disqualify the child in the future from appointments to jobs in the District or Federal government.

The court would be empowered to appoint other employes and to designate a social worker as commissioner to hold preliminary hearings.

District Representation.

Speaker Byrns declined to refer the District national representation resolution to the House District Committee after it had been introduced by Mrs. Norton. As in the past, it went to the Judiciary Committee.

The joint resolution would authorize Congress to submit a constitutional amendment to the States providing for national representation and suffrage in the National Capital on the same basis as the States.

Mrs. Norton said she would ask Chairman Sumners of the House Judiciary Committee to held public hearings on the resolution this session.

Five Motorists Lose Permits For Speeding

Five District motorists lost their driving permits yesterday under the new order governing first-offense speed convictions. Suspensions varied with the type of violation. Another driver, convicted of second offense speed, also came under the penalty.

Orders suspending the permits were signed by W. H. Murphy, secretary of the Board of Review and Revocation of Operators' Permits. The offending motorists will be notified of the board's action by registered mail.

It was explained that several Maryland drivers also were convicted of speeding. As yet, the District has no jurisdiction and can merely send notification of the violation to Maryland traffic authorities. One Maryland motorist, however, held a District permit.

Other Cases Pending.

Cases against two other drivers, accused of violating the speed limit in school zones, are pending before the board.

Those whose permits were ordered suspended and the length of time are as follows:

George W. Cochrane, 3505 Rittenhouse street, 30 days for 48 miles an hour, first offense; Leonard A. Schuttig, Silver Spring, Md., 30 days for 40 miles an hour, first offense; George M. Mackey, 4419 Volta place, 15 days, 35 miles an hour, first offense; Selden F. Nelligar, 607 Raleigh street southeast, 30 days, 44 miles an hour, first offense; James A. Harley, 1818 Gainsville street southeast, 15 days, 35 miles an hour, first offense; Reed H. Whitehurst, 1203 B street northeast, 30 days, 40 miles an hour, second offense.

Miss Meissa H. Reiss, 2900 block of Upton street northwest, paid a $100 fine in Traffic Court yesterday when convicted by Judge Gus A. Schuldt on reckless driving charges.

Miss Riess was arrested by Policeman S. R. Smith, of the First Precinct, while allegedly weaving in and out of traffic along upper Wisconsin avenue northwest. Had the fine not been paid, Miss Riess would have been committed to jail for 60 days under Judge Schuldt's order.

Motorman Exonerated.

Homer Glavens, 40, 237 Longfellow street northwest, a street car motorman of the Capitol Traction Co., was exonerated yesterday by a coroner's jury in the death of Private David Crouch, 66, of the Ninth Precinct.

Crouch, who died January 14, at Casualty Hospital, received a fractured skull, January 5, when his automobile collided with a street car driven by Glavens at First and D streets northeast. His was the ninth traffic death.

One Pet Is Dead, 3 Ill After Eating Baits; Police Aid Asked.

Residents of Brightwood who own dogs last night entreated police authorities to catch the person who already has poisoned four dogs in the neighborhood.

One pet is dead, another dying and two others apparently recovering from poison baits put out by some unidentified person whom the grieving owners describe as a "fiend."

The poison is a type which, when used on dogs, has particularly "horrible" effects, they add. Before they die their bodies are said to become rigid and their jaws to work spasmodically.

So frightened was the neighbors that many persons are keeping their pets indoors all the time.

Collie Early Victim.

One of the first victims of the poisoning was "Fritz," a collie owned by Bill Raab, 13, of 701 Quackenbos streets northwest. Bill had owned Fritz for six years. They were inseparable.

Yesterday morning the dog was let out. He came back in a few minutes, deathly sick. His hindquarters seemed paralyzed. The Raabs took him to Dr. E. E. Reubush, a veterinary, who said he was poisoned.

It was only a few minutes later that Dr. Reubush received D. M. Dulin, of 5514 Seventh street northwest, who was carrying his sick fox terrier.

Pet for 12 Years.

This dog had been an ex-officio member of the Dulin family for 12 years. It had been let out as Fritz had. When it returned it started to walk upstairs, answering Mrs. Dulin's call, got half-way up and fell back.

Both Fritz and the fox terrier are at the veterinarian's, very sick, but still alive.

Paternity Test Dropped In Case Against Wife, 19

A blood test by two Washington physicians to determine the paternity of an infant child was discarded by Justice Jesse C. Adkins in the District Supreme Court yesterday because of the generality of the finding.

The question was brought up in the case of Mrs. Lois Elmora Kessler, 19 years old, whose child's paternity was questioned by her husband. The physicians reported the blood test showed that the child was one from a large group of "blood types" and that there was nothing definite in the test to determine specific paternity. Mrs. Kessler is represented by Attorney Raymond Neudecker.

Group Backs Call for More Health Funds

Social Committee Asks That Congress Pass Full D. C. Item.

Airport Project Bill Is Disapproved in Budget Bureau Report.

Demands that "the Government should shift the emphasis to health in District affairs" were voiced yesterday afternoon at a meeting of the health committee of the Council of Social Agencies.

Throwing its wight behind the campaign the Medical Society and the Board of Trade, the committee adopted a resolution recommending that the Council of Social Agencies and all the agencies it represents should press Congress for the passage of the original estimates of the Commissioners for the Health Department and for the hospitals under the Board of Public Welfare.

Slashes Reported.

It was brought out at the meeting, at which Dr. Loren B. T. Johnson, presided, that the Commissioners' figures have been so cut deeply before being presented to Congress as to make it doubtful that improvement in Washington's high death rate from tuberculosis and other causes may be expected.

The meeting was attended by 40 representatives of local health agencies, including the Hospital Superintendents Association, Social Hygiene Society, Washington Heart Association, Tuberculosis Association, Medical Society, Board of Trade, Instructive Visiting Nurses Association, Society for the Prevention of Blindness; Georgetown, Garfield, Columbia, Providence, Children's and George Washington hospitals; Community Chest, Family Service Association, Central Admitting Bureau for Hospitals and the Jewish Charities.

Meanwhile at the District Building it was learned that development of a municipal airport at this time had been disapproved by the Budget Bureau in a report to the District Commissioners by D. W. Bell, acting director of the bureau. Report of Bell was made on a pending House bill which provided for the acquisition of necessary land and the establishment and operation of a municipal airport.

"You are advised," the director wrote, "that the expenditures contemplated by this proposed legislation would not be in accord with the financial program of the President."

Other Bills Opposed.

Similar adverse reports were made by the bureau on three other pending District measures. One, introduced by Senator Townsend, (Republican), of Delaware, would appropriate $600,000 out of District funds to be used for the reimbursement of persons who paid street improvement assessments and penalties and afterward discovered they need not have done so under subsequent court decisions. The fight over this and similar measures has been waged for several years. The commissioners have opposed the measures.

The Truman bill providing for erection o fa new Recorder of Deeds office in a building separate from the proposed minor courts building also was disapproved. The commissioners had made an adverse report to the bureau on the measure.

Also rejected was the Copeland bill, which would fix a minimum retirement pension for policemen and firemen at $100 and would have fixed a minimum pension of $60 a month for widows, plus $10 a month for each child under 16 years of age.

Post's Cruising Reporter Finds Negligent Drivers Offering Ignorance of Law as Excuse and 'Influence' as Means of Escape

(Editor's note: In an effort to determine the answer to Washington's present traffic problem, with its mounting toll of accidents, The Post has assigned a reporter to learn the reason behind violations of traffic regulations. A reporter, accompanied by an official of the Police Traffic Division, is cruising in a police car. Motorists who violate the law are stopped. Their side of the story is recorded. It is The Post's desire merely to learn "the reason why" of violations. This is the eighth in a series of stories.)

By Howard F. Wentworth.

Influence (professed) and ignorance (admitted) went hand in hand yesterday as violators of District traffic regulations sought to evade arrest and offer feeble excuses for careless and negligent driving.

Out-of-town motorists were the ones to profess ignorance of local laws. Yet their violations, open and flagrant, probably wouldn't be tolerated by traffic officials of their home States. They even resented courteous and instructive suggestions tendered by Capt. Milton D. Smith, newly appointed commander of the police traffic division.

Capt. Smith was our cruising "observer" yesterday as we toured the city in a police car to seek the "reason" behind infractions. Sergt. Joseph D. Harrington, also of the traffic division, acted as pilot.

On Pennsylvania avenue southeast, our attention was attracted by a large sedan speeding and zigzagging through traffic ahead of us. Sergt. Harrington gave our cruiser "the gas." In another moment, we saw the offending car bore Pennsylvania license plates. The driver cut in and out among moving vehicles. First he passed on the left and then on the right.

We stopped him near the Capitol grounds. He was from Philadelphia—said he had just arrived in town. He admitted later, however, that he had been here since early morning and had seen signs designating speed limits. He appeared surly and resentful at Capt. Smith's questions.

"I don't know of anything I did wrong," said the visiting driver. "In Philadelphia we are permitted to pass on the right. Maybe I wasn't doing just what I should, but I don't know your laws."

Told to Read Up.

He was advised to acquaint himself with local regulations before his carelessness brought injury or death to an innocent person.

We left this visiting law-breaker mumbling to himself and soon were cruising slowly through the northeast section. At Eighth and F streets we found one of the most hazardous infractions yet encountered.

An automobile, the rear end extending well into the center of the street, was parked with the front wheels on the sidewalk. There was no driver at the wheel. Several persons were seated in the car. The vehicle bore Texas tags. Capt. Smith jumped from our cruiser. Here was a violation the danger of which could be recognized by a child. The explanation:

"The driver went into a store to make a purchase. He left the brakes off and the car drifted onto the sidewalk. Beg pardon?—yes, I know how to drive."

It's News to Them.

And one of the occupants (who had made no effort to stop the auto when it "drifted") took the wheel and parked at the curb. These Texans were astonished to hear that they were contributing factors to the increasing danger on Washington streets.

Later in the afternoon we changed our tactics and continued cruising in the sidecar of a motorcycle driven by Policeman R. Randall, of the traffic division. In front of a downtown department store we found a motorist seated in his car, blocking the entrance and forcing other cars (taxis, etc.) to unload in the center of the street. This violator was arrested and taken to the traffic division.

He pleaded to be "let off this once." His record showed that he had been arrested previously for a similar offense. Then he became indignant.

Dated Up for Court.

So, because this motorist was "driving a Congressman's wife," Policeman Randall will meet him in court Tuesday. It was nearly 4:30 p. m., so we next cruised north on Sixth street northwest. (Sixth street is one-way north between 4 and 6 p. m.)

Hardly had we started when a truck approached us, traveling the wrong way. The driver "just didn't see the signs," yet admitted driving in Washington for a number of years. He, too, was arrested. En route to the Second Precinct Station, we were stopped by a traffic jam near Seventh and T streets northwest.

Policeman Randall looked ahead. A car, parked double, was causing the jam. Cars were swerving to avoid a collision. The double-parker was invited to join our procession and we continued to the station house. Neither driver could offer logical excuses. They were charged and ordered to post collateral.

Downtown again, we circled the new House Office Building. Cars (many of them) bearing Congressional tags, were parked in violation of the law. One obstructed the view of motorists approaching the corner of New Jersey avenue and C streets southeast—a dangerous hazard.

Tuesday, a Congressional committee is going to study Washington's traffic problem. We wonder what they'll find.

The lesson-sermon also includes the following passage from the Christian Science textbook, "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," by Mary Baker Eddy: "We must receive the divine principle in the understanding, and live it in daily life: and unless we do so, we can no more demonstrate science than we can teach and illustrate geometry by calling a curve a straight line or a straight line a sphere."

Nats Trade Hadley, Johnson to Yankees for DeShong, Hill

By Shirley Povich.
Sports Editor of The Post.

THE Washington and New York baseball clubs, mildly panicky at their prospects as the 1936 pennant race approaches, yesterday announced a player trade involving two pitchers and two outfielders.

In a deal completed by long-distance telephone, the Nats acquired Pitcher Jimmy DeShong and Outfielder Jesse Hill from the Yankees in an even exchange for Pitcher Irving Hadley and Outfielder Roy Johnson.

DeShong and Johnson represent the chief objectives of the trade. The Yankees, balked in their efforts to obtain Heinie Manush from the Nats when Manush was traded to Boston, were still eager to add left-handed hitting power to their outfield and thus desired Johnson, a lusty southpaw slugger.

Washington, chiefly intent on strengthening its pitching staff, was motivated by the prospect of acquiring DeShong, a young right-hander whose pitching Manager Bucky Harris had long admired. Originally, the Nats demanded both DeShong and Hill in an even exchange for Johnson, but with the Yankees balking at a deal on that basis, Hadley was tossed into the trade.

Both Griffith and Manager Harris discount the loss of Hadley's services, pointing out that the 30-year-old veteran who has had three trials with the Nats, is a confirmed in-and-outer whose presence on the team has been of little value.

Johnson leaves the Nats without ever having appeared in a Washington uniform. He was acquired from the Boston Red Sox last month along with Carl Reynolds in exchange for Henie Manush and even at that time was regarded chiefly as trading material.

The coming of Hill to the Nats is calculated to affect the makeup of both the outfield and infield of the Washington club. Manager Harris declared yesterday that Hill would be installed as the team's regular left fielder and pointed out that he would be an ideal lead-off man for the batting order.

Creditable Batter.

Hill, a 25-year-old performer, hit .293 with the Yankees last season, an average that is considered creditable for a lead-off man. He is rated among the fleetest of the league's outfielders and represents one more right-handed hitter in the Washington lineup that is top-heavy with left-handers.

With Hill in left field, Cecil Travis is expected to return to the Washington infield, either at third base or at shortstop. Travis was pressed into service in the outfield after the Nats had determined upon a rebuilding process and announced their intention to trade the aging Heinie Manush.

DeShong, like Hill, is a graduate of the Yankees' Newark farm. Appearing chiefly in relief roles last season he was the sixth-ranking pitcher in the league in point of effectiveness, boasting an earned-run average of 3.29, a figure far superior to the best effort of any Washington pitcher. He was credited with four victories and one defeat.

After winning 16 games and losing 10 with Newark in 1933, DeShong was recalled by the Yankees in 1934 when he won six and lost seven. He is a well-built right-hander standing 5 feet 11 inches and weighing 175 pounds. Through-

Jockeys, Trainers Hit by New Ruling

By a Staff Correspondent.

Miami, Fla., Jan. 17.—Jockeys and trainers under suspension at one track will not be given the privileges of any other track until their cases have been settled. This amendment was made to the rule on corrupt practices by the National Association of State Racing Commissioners at its convention here today.

The reports of the committees on the approval of an international race, nationalization of license for trainers, and on uniform saliva and drug tests, were received and approved. A discussion and demonstration that may lead to the national use of the photographic finish took up part of the day.

Tom Thorp, racing and football official and sportswriter, made a plea for a higher scale of weights, pointing out that under the present system few jockeys have more than five years at their profession. A plan for jockey insurance was adopted.

Greyhound racing will be discussed at tomorrow's closing session. The group voted to hold next winters convention in this city.

New York Betting Scandal 'Blows Up'

Fleischer told the commission Tuesday he made a personal investigation two years ago and found Beck was supplying gamblers with information on how judges were scoring various fights.

Hoyas Conquer Pitt, 43 to 42 With Rally

Lose Lead in Regulation Game, Then Triumph in Extra Period.

By Lewis F. Atchison.

A PERSPIRING and pugnacious Georgetown quintet that seemed hopelessly doomed to defeat in the first half of the game thrice came from behind to upset Pittsburgh, 43-42, in a thrill-drenched overtime battle last night at Tech High School.

Three thousand frenzied fans, screamed like madmen near the end of the regulation game when Georgetown was thought to have won, 35-29, saw the harrassed Hoyas overtaken in the last few seconds of play by the Panthers at 35-35. They saw them lag by a 40-39 count as the extra five minutes opened, and then rally for a fighting finish that carried them to victory in the most exciting court play the town has witnessed this winter.

Even as the final and decisive gun was barking they saw Ed Spotovich, Pitt guard, reaching up for the basket that would have given his mates a 44-43 victory. Spotovich's effort was good, but too late to avoid defeat. The gun saved Georgetown from being victim to another rally similar to that staged by Temple here before the Christmas holidays.

It was Pitt's second Eastern Conference defeat and meant virtual elimination from the race for the championship crown the Panthers have held three consecutive years since the loop was organized. It was the Hilltopper's first league victory and helped tighten their grip on fourth place in the young race.

False Whistle.

Fans, howling gleefully in the thought that Georgetown had won, swarmed out onto the playing floor when the timekeeper's whistle blew with the Hilltoppers holding a 35-29 advantage. But a minute of play remained and the whistle had sounded only to signal a substitution. It was several minutes before the playing court was cleared of spectators and play resumed.

Pitt's rally struck like a bolt of lightning among stunned Georgetown supporters and players alike as the Hoyas had seemed to be "in" with a 6-point lead and one minute to go. But Bill Jesko, Joe Garcia and Spotovich came through with field goals and tied the count at 35-all just as the final gun spat, and the District aggregation seemed condemned to the same fate that befell it in the Temple game.

Petroskey, however, launched another rally as the extra period got under way, sinking a long shot, followed by Buddy Nau. But Garcia, and Ted Roderick sank field goals and Bob Johnson converted a foul, giving Pitt a 40-to-39 lead with two minutes to go. Then came Harry Bassin's fifth field goal of the evening, followed by another of Petroskey's making before Johnson dribbled in for a snow-bird and the final points of the game.

Poor First Half.

Georgetown seemed doomed on the strength of its play in the first half, which ended with Pitt coasting along on a 21-to-12 lead. Fred Mesmer's pupils handled the ball unskillfully, and it appeared to be one of those off nights every team encounters when they can't make a field goal with a stepladder.

By the Associated Press.

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 17.—"Wild Bill" Mehlhorn teamed up with a wild wind today and literally blew into the lead at the start of the $3,000 Sacramento Open golf tournament.

The Louisville, Ky., professional shaved a stroke off par with a 71 and led a field of 113 amateurs and money players by a stroke.

Even with par for the 6,800-yard municipal course were three other professionals, Charles Lacey, Great Neck, Long Island; Emory Zimmerman, Portland, Oreg., and Art Straub, Brielle, N. J.

Trailing at 74 were Ky Laffoon, Chicago; Harold McSpaden, unattached, and winner of the meet last year; Ernie Pieper, San Jose amateur, who led the simon-pures; Horton Smith, Chicago; Jack Grout, Fort Worth, Tex.; Harry Cooper, Chicago; William Bolger, Australia; Al Zimmerman, Portland, brother of Emory; Jack Fessezke, Jackson, Mich., and J. J. McHugh, San Francisco.

Mehlhorn played the long course, made heavy by a week of rains, perfectly except for the fourteenth hole, where he went two over par 4. In the first thirteen holes he had 2 birdies and 11 pars.

Jimmy Hines, Garden City, Long Island, winner of the Los Angeles and Riverside Opens, could do no better than a 76, where he was tied by Walter Hagen, Detroit; Willie Goggin, San Francisco; Sam Parks, jr., National Open champion, and Leo Walper, Washington, D. C.

Coaches Assail Grid Scoring Proposal

Plan Is Opposed by 9-to-1 Margin in Poll; Little Calls It Illogical.

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—A rousing chorus of "Noes" today greeted the proposal for a new football scoring system involving the abolishment of the try for extra point, the award of a point for each first down and 5-minute overtime period to break ties.

Football coaches in all parts of the country, polled by the Associated Press, vetoed the idea with emphasis and by a 9-to-1 margin. Their opposition to other proposed rules changes, including return of the goal posts to the goal line, was less pronounced.

Walter R. Okeson, of Lehigh, chairman, and other members of the National Collegiate Rules Committee, were non-committal on the radical alterations proposed yesterday by Bill Crowley, of New York, former president of the Eastern Association of Football Officials.

Judging from current reaction, there is no chance whatever that the rules-makers will tinker with the scoring system when they go into annual session at Palm Springs, Calif., February 14.

Coaches for the most part ridiculed the scoring proposal and insisted it would rob the game of its present-day thrills by putting emphasis again on the old "rock 'em and sock 'em" style of play. It would, in the opinion of Al McCoy, of Northeastern University, Boston, "destroy in the Haughton and Michigan theories of kicking and letting the other fellow take the offensive, with the idea of capitalizing on breaks or mistakes."

Points for first downs, according to Lou Little, of Columbia, and Charley Bachman, of Michigan State, would be no more logical than giving a baseball team points for men left on bases. Drawing the parallel further, Bobby Morris, of Seattle, referee of the Rose Bowl game, suggested it would be like scoring a half-run for a two-base hit.

"A man could run the length of the field for a touchdown, getting only six points, whereas a team might pound its way to the 1-yard line, losing the ball there, but getting six or eight points for first downs," commented Bill Spaulding, virtually would eliminate clever U. C. L. A. coach.

This Morning . . .

With Shirley Povich

THE comparative ages of the four guys who figured in that Washington-New York player trade yesterday constitute the tip-off on the relative status of the Nats and the Yankees as far as next season's pennant race is concerned.

Teams don't make a habit of trading off a pair of 25-year-old youngsters for a couple of veterans who'll soon be 32, yet the Yankees did. The Yankees, you see, consider themselves in the thick of the 1936 pennant race and are willing to risk desperate measure to head off the threat of the Tigers and the Red Sox to make a two-team race out of it.

Manager Joe McCarthy and Owner Jake Ruppert apparently believe that the Yankees' chances of taking down first money are worth the gamble. They are willing to sacrifice future years of service in an attempt to bolster their team for the 1936 race. If Irving Hadley and Roy Johnson, their pair of 31-year-olds, help bring them a pennant, they will be rewarded.

POVICH.

The Nats, on the inevitable other hand, are building for the future. Clark Griffith will frankly admit that he anticipates no pennant in 1936. If his present crop of youngsters improves within the next few years, his veterans will have passed on. Griff welcomed the opportunity to acquire Jess Hill and Jimmy Deshong on the theory that his young team thus would mature in the same season.

AND another thing. New York fans were beginning to make talk. It is history that New York demands a winner. Ruppert has learned that at great cost to his pocketbook. The lush years of Babe Ruth and Yankee champions ended back in 1932 and the vast profits ended, too. New York fans know, also, that Ruppert possesses the biggest bankroll in all baseball and his apparent disposition to let the Yanks shift for themselves was not setting well with the fans.

With Tom Yawkey buying up the league's stars for the Red Sox and the Giants, their hated rival for New York patronage, keeping National League interest in the city at white heat with their numerous trades, it behooved the Yankees to do something in the buying or trading line on their own account. Thus they hope to appease yelping fans with the deal of yesterday, which is not startling as deals go, but which serves the purpose of maintaining interest in the Yanks.

Originally, Griffith demanded Pitcher Johnny Murphy from the Yankees in a straight swap for Roy Johnson, but that proposition was rejected by Manager McCarthy. Griffith then held out for Jimmy Deshong and Jesse Hill, and McCarthy in turn demanded that Hadley be included in the deal. Fed up with Hadley's failings in a Washington uniform, Griffith accepted the deal on that basis.

McCarthy visions Roy Johnson as the answer to the Yankees' need of more left-handed hitting. Ever since Ruth's decline, Lou Gehrig has been carrying on alone in using the convenient right-field bleachers as a home-run target. Johnson, a left-hander of slugging proclivities, will probably be the No. 2 home-run hitter of the Yankees by virtue of playing 77 games per year in Yankee Stadium. The Yanks had no great need for Hill, a right-handed hitter.

ACCORDING to Manager Bucky Harris, Hill will immediately be installed as the Nats' regular left fielder, enabling Cecil Travis to return to the infield. Paradoxically, there may be no place in the Washington infield for Travis, who already has proven his worth at third base and displayed the potentialities of a swell left fielder.

At Chattanooga, Manager Clyde Milan vows that young Buddy Lewis is Travis' superior as a defensive third baseman and equally as good a hitter. Travis, failing at shortstop, must battle Lewis for the third-base job. If he fails at that, he may be just a good third baseman and a good outfielder without a job on the team.

Griffith yesterday declared that he had not advised Travis of his intention to break him in as a shortstop, but that if Travis were not willing to try a new position he would not insist. When they meet in the South to talk contract, Griffith says he will offer Travis a raise in salary if he makes good at the shortstop post.

That Travis will take a fling at the shortstop job is a certainty, however. The 22-year-old youth has said that he has no preference. He was willing, nay eager, to try his hand at the outfield when Harris suggested it last fall, and, to hear him tell it, shortstop is the easiest job in the infield. "Ah always thought ah could play a pretty fair sho'stop," he'd probably drawl.

Italians Draw Olympic Ban; Called Pros

Several Bob-Sledders Are Disqualified; 1,200 in All Entered.

By the Associated Press.

GARMISCH-PARTENKIRCHEN, Germany, Jan. 17.—Several Italian bob-sledders, entered in the winter Olympics here February 6-16, have been disqualified on grounds of professionalism, it became known today as the German Olympic committee pored over the list of 1,200 contestants—by far the largest in the history of the winter games.

Several of the Italian bob-sledding teams had planned to use internationally-famed automobile race drivers as steersmen, but these have been declared ineligible. Affected by the ruling was Achille Varzi, well-known racing pilot, as well as Count Trossi, Cortese and Brivio.

In this connection, there has been concern in some quarters over the status of Karl Schaefer, Austria's great figure skater, world and Olympic champion. Although he is registered here as an amateur, word came today that the American Skating Union was investigating the conditions under which Schaefer's name was used in an advertisement in a sporting goods publication. It was recalled that Schaefer was questioned several months ago by the International Skating Union, but no action was taken.

A study of the entry list reveals that athletes between the ages of 11 and 50 will compete in the Olympics. Yetsuko Inada, 11-year-old Japanese girl figure skater, and Capt. Zahn, German bob-sledder, who is almost 50, represent the extremes in age among the competitors entered from 28 countries.

Virginia Gold Cup Race Will Be Held on May 2

Warrenton, Va., Jan. 17 (AP).—The Virginia Gold Cup Race Association's executive committee, meeting here today, announced it had applied to the National Steeplechase and Hunts Association for the date of Saturday, May 2, for the fourteenth running of the annual event.

The race, for which the purses and cup are expected to aggregate near $2,000, will be held over the Broad View course near here.

Retzlaff, Fearless, Drives Louis to Ropes at Start, but Is Victim of Murderous Counter-Attack by Negro.

By the Associated Press.

CHICAGO, Jan. 17.—Charley Retzlaff, raw-boned North Dakota rancher, finished lying on his side, his glassy eyes staring at the ring lights, exactly 1 minute and 25 seconds after he raised his hands for his scheduled 15-round fight with jolting Joe Louis in the Chicago Stadium tonight.

Thus, Louis, most murderous puncher since the days of Jack Dempsey, scored his twenty-third knockout in 27 fights to the accompaniment of screams and cheers from 14,100 spectators.

The knockout was complete. Retzlaff, paralyzed by the furious barrage of punches, tried to get up at the count of nine, but sank to his haunches and rolled over, to be counted out. He had to be helped to his corner, where handlers worked over him a few minutes.

Louis Sneers.

The blow just missed the chin and caused a sneer to creep over Louis' otherwise "dead pan."

The crowd was in a tremendous uproar at the courage displayed by Retzlaff. Louis drove a right to the head that was high, and then Retzlaff drove three rights to the body. The bold Retzlaff continued the attack, driving two rights to the head, forcing Louis to the ropes.

As Louis moved to the center of the ring, he apparently had decided to take no chances. He drilled a smashing left hook to the chin that floored Retzlaff. The North Dakotan started to get up at the count of three and then fell back. He got to his feet at the count of seven, but his legs were rubbery and he was badly hurt. Louis, seeing his foe in distress, tore after him in a terrific attack to the head and body. Retzlaff backed into the ropes, but could not escape the terrific punches of the rentless Louis.

The Brown Bomber, no longer needing to protect himself, cut loose with both hands to the head and body.

Retzlaff withered quickly under the merciless punishment. His head drooped to the top rope. He then attempted to support himself by hanging his elbow over the rope. Louis continued to bang away furiously with both hands.

Suddenly Retzlaff, his 6-foot 3-inch frame virtually paralyzed by the punches absorbed, sank to the floor. Louis was waved to a neutral corner, as Retzlaff gamely attempted to struggle to his feet.

"Get up Charley," screamed the ringside spectators.

Retzlaff was game, but his legs would not support him. As the timekeeper tolled off the count of nine he futilely tried to draw his wobbly legs under him. On his haunches, he settled and then rolled over on his side.

Joins Line on Floor.

And with the fatal count of ten Retzlaff went the way of all others, Carnera, Levinsky, Baer, Uzcudun who attempted to stop the amazing drive of the 21-year-old Detroit Negro toward the world's heavyweight championship.

Retzlaff, dazed from the battering, did not know the fight was over after he had been counted out. After he had been dragged to his corner and seated on his chair, he suddenly got up and started after Louis. His handlers grabbed but could not completely subdue him until he had smashed Louis on the back.

The attendance was somewhat disappointing possibly due to a snowstorm of blizzard proportions. The gross gate receipts reached $72,341.88. Louis will receive approximately 40 per cent, motion picture and broadcast, with Retzlaff receiving 17½ per cent of the gate only. Official attendance was 16,486.

Louis, not even mildly excited over his quickest conquest, said the fight went almost exactly as he and his trainer, gold-toothed Jack Blackburn, had planned.

"Jack said he was strictly a puncher who couldn't take it," the Bomber drawled. "The first hard punch I hit him started him on the way. That was a left hook.

"He was game though. Anybody could see that. He walked right into me—and got it. He didn't hit me a hard punch. That right everybody is talking about didn't land. I moved inside of it. He is the gamest guy I met since Carnera."

Retzlaff was still foggy as he pulled off his shoes and trunks in his dressing room. A few minutes later when his head cleared, he tacitly agreed with Louis that he had not landed an effective blow.

"I wasn't afraid of Louis, and I still think I would have hurt him if I had hit him square. I'd kinda like to try it again," Retzlaff said.

Grant, Hendrix Clash Today At Tampa

By the Associated Press.

TAMPA, Fla., Jan. 17.—Bryan Grant, jr., of Atlanta, who was unexpectedly blasted out of the recent Coral Gables Tournament by young Arthur Hendrix, of Lakeland, Fla., has a chance to average himself in the semifinals of the annual Dixie competition here tomorrow.

The question uppermost tonight in the minds of fans and players was whether Hendrix could repeat his success of the semifinals at Coral Gables and again trounce Grant, ranked third nationally.

In the other semifinal will be Charles Harris, of West Palm Beach, title holder, and Martin Buxby, of Miami, who scored the only upset of the tourney so far by eliminating Hal Surface, Kansas City flash, in today's play.

Grant Beats Mulloy.

Surface took the first set, 6—2, in easy fashion from Buxby, seeded No. 6, but Buxby got his backhand game working in the next two sets and eliminated the Kansas Cityan, 6—3, 6—4.

Harris-Buxby Win.

In the doubles quarter-finals Harris and Buxby defeated W. B. and Vernon Marcum, of Lakeland, 6—0, 6—3. Hendrix and Mulloy turned back Jack Mooney, of Atlanta, and Carroll Taylor, of Miami, 7—5, 5—7, 6—4. McDiarmid and Surface won over Jack Behr, of Miami, and Painter, 2—6, 6—3, 6—4.

The doubles match between Grant and Russell Bobbitt, Atlantan, and Harold McGuffin, Philadelphia, and Clyde Adams, of Waco, Tex., was halted by darkness with the score 8-all in the first set. Play will be resumed tomorrow afternoon.

Nevers Is Named Lafayette Coach

To Succeed McCracken, at Job for 12 Years.

By the United Press.

Easton, Pa., Jan. 17.—Ernie Nevers, former Stanford University All-American fullback, today was appointed football coach at Lafayette College, succeeding Herbert McCracken, who resigned after 12 years as mentor.

Henry W. Clark, recently appointed director of athletics at the college, said Nevers would come to Easton this week for a preliminary check-up on his duties.

Lafayette, once a power in Eastern football, is expected to attempt to regain some of its lost prestige under the new coach. The college had an exceptionally strong 1935 freshman team, and Nevers is expected to have fair material.

The 1936 schedule for the varsity, announced today, includes games with Muhlenburg, Pennsylvania, Gettysburg, Dickinson, Colgate, N. Y. U., Washington and Jefferson, Moravian and Lehigh.

Haynes Stops Ruggerillo.

Men, Women Clash in Tourney; Fair Golfers Are 'Not So Hot'

By the Associated Press.

MIAMI, Fla., Jan. 17.—The women had their troubles in the first 18 holes of the 36-hole $1,500 Tropic Open — South Florida's first such event featuring golfers of both sexes—today.

Helen Hicks, former national champion who recently turned "business woman" golfer, needed 91 strokes, trailing most of the men professionals, while Maureen Orcutt Crews, who has won almost everything but the national, finished with 86, 11 strokes behind the amateur leader.

Topping the field of professionals, at the end of the first day's play, were Denny Shute and Frank Walsh, two Chicago veterans, and Frank Kringle, comparative newcomer from Linden, N. J. They toured the par 72 Miami Country Club course in 69.

At the head of the string of amateurs that included such notables in other fields of endeavor as Buddy Rogers, band leader and film player; Vernon (Lefty) Gomez, New York Yankees' pitcher, and Waite Hoyt, Pittsburgh Pirates hurler, was Ralph Doll, Canton, Ohio, with a 75.

Frank Moore, of St. Louis, led still another division of the split money tournament—the "half-stroke putt" category, in which $500 of the prize money was posted.

By the regular scoring methods Moore finished with 73. Counting his putts as half strokes only, however, he had 35, by virtue of good driving and approaching. A half-stroke back, with 35½, was Kringle.

Pacho Beats Locatelli By Technical Knockout

New York, Jan. 17 (AP).—Bobby Pacho, Los Angeles lightweight, scored a technical knockout over Cleto Locatelli, of Italy, in the eighth round of what was to have been a 10-round fight in Madison Square Garden tonight.

Aflyin' Will Go! His Only Worry Is Coming Down.

By Jack Miley.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—Well, well, my fine-feathered friends, what have we here? Today's four-star special news bulletin out of Bradenton, Fla., has it that the one and only Dizzy Dean is taking flying lessons and that he has already placed his order for one of those mail order sky skimmers, complete with parachute and retractable life insurance. My stars and garters!

Why, it seems like only yesterday, that Branch Rickey's posse of manhunters tracked down old Diz in his native Arkansas wilderness, roped and shod him and lured the horrified hill-billy aboard his first railroad train by the simple deception of putting plow handles on the Pullman doors. And now the sycopathic pitcher is buying one of those stratosphere sleds. We always thought there was a bit of eagle in Jerome. Why the Zanie is the Icarus of the Ozarks!

Remember Icky, that ill-fated aerial acrobat in Greek mythology? Neither did we, until we made a three-point landing on the encyclopedia before slapping out this screed. But it seems, according to legend, that Icarus and his pappy, Daedaelus, got themselves tossed into the sneezer for bootlegging bay leaves on the outskirts of Olympus.

BECAUSE they were a couple of Baumes law boys, King Minos threw the book at them. When they found out they had to do it all the hard way they broke bob and the first thing anybody knew, they were lamsters out of a Greek pokey, trying to get back to Thrace to organize the toga makers' mob.

In the desperation of their flight they hit upon the first cloud jumper, thus copping a sneak of countless centuries upon those Johnny comelately's, Bleriot and the Wright brothers. Daedaelus, a cozy old coot who knew all the angles, did the heavy lifting and Icky jammed the works.

Dade, as he was known to the other loafers around the coffee shops, devised a couple of sets of wings for himself and Icky. These were made of bits of string, gobs of wax and were plumed with peacocks' piazzas. "Icky, my boy," Daedaelus admonished his offspring, as he fitted these flappers to Icarus' shoulder blades, "Use your noodle and watch your step."

IF you fly too low, the sea spray will soak these goopus feathers (Ed. note, old Greek term for the fuzz of peaches) and if you fly too high, the sun's heat will touch you off like a roman candle.

Icarus promised to steer a cautious middle course, but since aviators even in those days were all slightly off center, he forgot his vows as soon as he got a little altitude. This enthusiastic earthling did a few Immelmann turns, a couple of outside loops and then dove into the drink when the rays of the sun set him ablaze like a nervous bride's first beefsteak. Old Daedaelus was so discouraged by this catastrophe that he went back to the bastile and gave himself up—and that was that.

Not that we're trying to put the whammie on Dizzie Dean, you understand. Nor do we think that this screwy stump-jumper will vanish beneath the phosphorescent waves of the Gulf Stream before this slab-sided scissorbill takes his mail order jalopi off the ground.

DIZZY has a perfect right to fly and Singin' Sam Breadon, the John McCormack of the magnates, will have a helluva time stopping him once the Lindbergh begins to crop out in this eccentric athlete. There is nothing in Dizzy's contract that says he must keep more than one foot on the ground at all times.

It seems no more than right that if Pepper Martin, another Cardinal problem child, is allowed to race midget autos for thrills that poor old Diz should be given the freedom of that starry canopy. After all, there are no corners, trees nor beer trucks up there to strain or maim his million-dollar wing. The only thing he need worry about is coming down. If Diz is a leetle mite careful about dropping his wheels on the turf, he'll be okay.

Can you imagine taking a Sunday afternoon sky spin with the Deans? There'd be Diz at the helm; plump Patricia, his forceful frau, doing the back-seat driving, and young Daffy Dean insisting, as usual, that that "Whatever Diz does, goes for me, too!" Then Patsy, the best-looking hosiery saleswoman that ever sold a pair of reinforced heels (we don't mean Diz and Daf; Breadon will attend to that!) to the cowgirls of Fort Worth, will chime up: "Look out for that pink cloud, Jay; drive around it dear, not through it! But no matter how high Dizzy may soar, he'll never attain more altitude than he does on a tough day against the Giants or Cubs when the famous hop on his fast one fails to fool the belligerent batoneers.

Friends Five Winner Over Landon, 19-11

Friends School avenged a football trouncing received last fall from Landon Prep by swamping the latter's basketball team yesterday, 19 to 11, on the Friends' court. The Quakers never trailed after the first minute of play.

Taking a 12-8 lead in the first half, they mounted it to 17-9 going into the final quarter. Johnny Gwynn, Washington boy, led the Quakers' scoring drive with nine points.

Howard Campbell Stakes and Women's Dixie Tourney Slated.

CAPITAL duckpin bowlers will start competition for two of the city's major bowling events of the season tonight—the popular Howard Campbell sweepstakes, restricted to local male entries, and the Women's Dixie tournament, which is the South's feature attraction among the fair sex stars.

As in the past, the Campbell stakes will be rolled over a period of three successive Saturdays, over a 15-game stretch. The first five-game block will be rolled at the Lucky Strike alleys at 8 p. m., the second block at the Georgetown Recreation and the final at the Convention Hall.

Arville Ebersole, secretary of the Washington City Duckpin Association, has lined up close to 25 of the city's top-notch stars. The prestige carried by the event, besides the big cash prize and the diamond medal which goes to the victor, makes the stakes the most colorful of the local duckpin affairs. Over a period of nine years, none of the previous champions has achieved the distinction of repeating. Eddie Espey is the defending champion.

Of the $28 required for the entrance fee, $25, will go toward the prize money which should total close to $500.

The probable entry list includes Joe Harrison, Reds Megaw, Ed Schlagel, Eddie Espey, Bill Krauss, "Hokie" Smith, Paul Jarman, Dave Burrows, Howard Campbell, Sam Simon, Irving Billheimer, Bob Temple, "Dutch" Newman, Ed Blakeney, Joe Fraschi, Perce Wolfe, Ben Hare, Louis Pantos, Jack Talbert, Richard La Bille, Tom Reviere, Clarence Sling and Brad Mandley. Astor Clarke, the Capital's No. 1 bowler, will compete if he is allowed to roll his games in the Virginia State tournament in the afternoon.

Ida Simmons, of Norfolk, the Nation's first ranking duckpinnist, will head the invasion of close to 60 of the country's foremost duckpinnists in competition for the championship of the Ladies Dixie tournament opening at noon at the Silver Spring (Md.) alleys. Miss Simmons is the defending champion, topping Lorraine Gulli, Capital star, for the title last season.

Due to the large entry list the field will be divided into two sections, the first starting at 12 and 1:30, the second at 2:30 and 4 at the Arcadia alleys, and the final block at 7 and 8:30 at the Rosslyn (Va.) drives.

Are Among First 20.

Most of the competing stars are listed among the first 20 ranking bowlers of the country. Entries have been received from Bridgeport, Conn., Baltimore, Norfolk, Richmond and the District. Florence LaBarr, former United States Singles champion, and Alice Dluga, twice selected as the Nation's No. 1 honorary duckpinnist, are the two Connecticut entries.

Baltimore's top ranking stars who will take part are Mary Galloway, Helen Spencer, Anna Adams, Frances King, Catherine Manners, Marie Brown, Sue Miller, Ethel Brewer, Alice Shaw, Evenlyn Conrey, Naomi Zimmerman and Audrey Mullaney. Norfolk will be represented by Ida Simmons and Katherine Stevens, and Richmond by Helen Randlett, Olivia Schmidt and Dorothy Edwards. The local entry will be paced by the Rosslyn team, leader of the South Atlantic Ladies League, boasting such District notables as Lorraine Gulli, Lucille Young, Evelyn Ellis, Rena Levy and Margaret Wootten.

Paul Dean 'Laying By' For Dainy Day—In '50

Dallas, Tex., Jan. 17 (AP).—Paul Dean, close-mouthed pitching counterpart of his loud-mouthed brother, Dizzy, quietly discussed plans tonight for the day when the fire departs his "fast 'un."

Paul, a veteran of two major league seasons with the St. Louis Cardinals, is "laying a little by" to keep him going after the inevitable collapse of his money arm. However, he optimistically fixes that time as 1950.

"I've seen too many old broken-down ball players who failed to save when they were in the money," said the 21-year-old right hander. Yesterday he purchased a $10,000 farm near Dallas. Some time ago he invested in a Dallas residential property.

Maryland Body To Poll Clubs On Stymie

Special Dispatch to The Post.

BALTIMORE, Md., Jan. 17—After a completely harmonious election at the Green Spring Valley Hunt Club tonight, the Maryland State Golf Association took action upon three important subject two of which required some debate.

William Deal Waxter, jr., member of the host club, took office along with the slate designated by the nominating committee, and the first three problems to arise under his administration dealt with the stymie, handicaps and pros.

A resolution was passed that a poll be taken in the member clubs of the association and the clubs register their wishes as to whether the stymie be abolished or retained. The result will be laid before the United States Golf Association at the next annual meeting.

Uniform Handicaps.

On the handicap question, the executive committee was empowered to consider the various systems and decide upon one to be recommended for adoption by all the member clubs. At present the State association and the Baltimore clubs use the Watson-Smith system, while the Washington clubs use the Calkins.

With regard to the pros, the executive committee was ordered to reply to a letter asking the opinion of the State body on proposed standards of open tournaments with an emphatic disapproval of the suggestions. The pros are considering setting standard minimum purses of from $3,000 to $5,000, a maximum entry fee of $5 and demanding that the entry fees be not made part of the purse, but assigned to a fund for general publicizing of tournaments.

Other officers chosen were:

Vice president, Washington district—Emmons Smith, jr., Chevy Chase.

Secretary—Harry P. Gallagher, Baltimore Country Club.

Representatives of clubs present included: Beaver Dam, R. M. Brown; Chevy Chase, Robert Stead, jr.; Columbia Country Club, M. R. West; Manor, J. A. Cosgrove; Woodmont Country Club, Albert E. Steinem.

Nats and Yankees In Four-Man Deal

Hill was a former star athlete at the University of Southern California before joining the Hollywood Club of the Coast League in 1930. Five feet ten inches tall and weighing 175 pounds, he was sold to the Yankees in 1932 and in 1934 was the fifth ranking batter in the International League with an average of .344.

Hadley was a distinct disappointment to the Nats last season after his purchase from the St. Louis Browns at a cost of $20,000 plus the transfer of Catcher Luke Sewell. The big right-hander with a tendency to both wildness and fatness won only 10 games last season against 16 defeats and exhausted the patience of Griffith who originally acquired him from the sandlots in 1926.

Georgetown Raliles To Nip Pitt, 43-42

But "Leviticus" Petroskey, Georgetown center, inaugurated a Georgetown rally at the start of the second half that brought his team within whispering distance of the visitors. Gibeau followed Petroskey's shot with another goal, and Tom Nolan dropped two in quick succession, making the score 21-20 in Pitt's favor.

Pitt assumed a 29-26 lead on baskets by Zelesnick and Radvansky before Georgetown's offensive rally reached its peak. Petroskey sank his second goal, Tommy Keating followed with two, Don Gibeau made another and Harry Bassin converted a foul to make it 35-29 in Georgetown's favor with a minute to play. Then came the boys who really started playing.

C. U. Is Routed At Scranton, 44 to 21

St. Thomas Five Rolsl Up Early Lead to Atone for 1935 Defeat.

SCRANTON, Pa., Jan. 17.—Catholic University's basketball array played loosely in the face of a dazzling offense by its opponents and absorbed a 44-21 defeat from St. Thomas College before 2,500 spectators tonight.

St. Thomas ran up a 9-point lead in the first six minutes of play, and the best efforts of the redoubtable Herman Schmarr and Bernie Leib were unable to reduce the Tommies' big early advantage. eib left the tussle three minutes before its end on personals.

The Flying Cardinals were held to 6 points in the first half as they lost their second engagement in five starts this season. In winning St. Thomas gained an exact measure of revenge, last February in Washington Catholic U. beat the Tommies by the same margin, 23 points.

Roosevelt Upsets Central; Western Victor Over Tech

Frank Bailey Sets Pace as Rough Riders Win by 28-20 Score.

By George Considine.

ROOSEVELT, aided and abetted by the individual prowess of Frank Bailey, scored a decided upset in the interhigh basketball series yesterday in the Tech gym by trouncing Central, 28 to 20. It was the Rough Riders' first series victory in two years.

In spite of Roosevelt's nickname there was nothing rough about the aforesaid Bailey yesterday. He worked with the smoothness and rhythm of Guy Lombardo both in his field generalship and versatility of shot-making. He was high-point man with 13.

Central Takes Lead.

Central took an early lead, going to 4 to 1 before Bailey's presence became known in the scoring column. But the fighting Billy Vermillion perdominated and as a result Central maintained a 7-to-5 edge at the end of the first period.

No sooner had the second quarter opened than Bailey tied it up with a beautiful angle shot. Vermillion carried on for Central, sinking a snowbird, which, added to Fones' foul shot, enabled Central again to assume a commanding lead. Fogel and Beamer retaliated with a foul and field goal, respectively, and Bailey's long one put Roosevelt out in front 12 to 11 just before the half-way mark.

Goes on Another Spree.

It was Bailey again throughout the third period as Central challenged furiously but, it developed, in vain. Backed up by Kolius and Thompson, Frank went on another spree and by the end of the third quarter Roosevelt was ahead, 21 to 16, and still going strong.

Vermillion came to life as the last lap opened and brought confidence to his tiring Central mates by sinking one, while far off balance. But Bailey put more daylight between the teams with two brilliant shots from midfloor in rapid succession.

Richmond Foe Of Md. Five Tonight

FRESH from their decisive conquest of Navy, Maryland's beefy courtmen will try to avenge another old and irritating score tonight at College Park where they play host to the invading University of Richmond sharp-shooters. To enable fans and players alike to see the boxing match between Catholic U. and Maryland at Brookland, the game has been moved up to 7 o'clock, and will get under way promptly.

Richmond appeared to be somewhat overrated when it lost to the potent scoring machine representing George Washington recently, but the Old Liners prefer to discard that game from the dope sheet and expect to encounter formidable opposition tonight. Maryland is out to avenge a 56-20 beating they absorbed from the Spiders last winter at College Park.

Virtually the same team that started against Navy will occupy the same roles tonight. Vic Willis, Al Waters, Bernie Buscher, Ben Allen and Johnny McCarthy are expected to start. Richmond's line-up has not been announced, but it probably will be the same as that which opened against George Washington.

Sablin, $3.20 Choice, Wins at Hialeah

Gelding 2-Length Victor; Daily Double Returns $132.50 Mutuel.

By Walter Haight,
A Staff Correspondent.

HIALEAH Park Race Track, Miami Fla., Jan. 17.—After the hustle and bustle of a record breaking opening day, Hialeah Park, man's most beautiful monument to the horse, settled down today to the routine of the long meeting here in the Empire of the Sun. The 10,000 customers, who constitute an average crowd, were in attendance.

Racing was conducted under the weather conditions that President Clark Griffith prays for on the opening day at the ball park. A sun that never heard of NRA hours was productive, a mild breeze rustled the palms along the backstretch and sent ripples scurrying across the infield lake and the horses went round and round.

Sablin Was Feature.

The principal round and round was accomplished by Sablin, a gelded son of Display. Jockey Nick Wall was pressing the middle valve down. Those who bet on the favorite "came out here" with $3.20.

Sablin's backers played him with a vigor that sent up the yellow tape on the thermometer-like odds board, an indication that the price was going down. Sablin was worthy of every nickle as the race was run. He led from start to finish and, with the all-important wire reached, had an advantage of two lengths over Corinto. Cheshire and four "also rans" were in the rear flight.

Only a few persons in the extreme upper left cornor of the grandstand can see the start of races out of the mile chute here. I'm told that Sablin almost tore down the starting gate and finally was moved out of his assigned No. 1 stall to a position in the open on the outside, where he could huff and puff to his heart's content.

Others Shift Positions.

However, when the field came into view from under the orange awning of the clubhouse, there was Sablin burning oil in front. There was much shifting of positions behind him, but it was all of a secondary nature as far as the first money was concerned.

Sablin is owned by E. F. Seagram, of the Icy Canada Seagrams.

For the second day the daily double mutuel went into the three figure class. A reward of $132.50 awaited those who invested the usual $2 in the combination of Balanced Budget and Canter Boy. The latter sent the "double" stock booming, for he was a $30.30 mutuel in his own right. Canter Boy also is property of Mr. Seagram.

Officials here showed that they were in business by issuing a ruling that the future entry of the horse, Jim John, will be refused at the meeting because he was started yesterday in unfit condition.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—HATTY, $10.10, $7.00, $4.40; ROCKWOOD, $12.00, $5.90; BRAVO CARUSO (field), $3.00.

HATTY away clearly, racing straight and true down the middle of the track, was in command after opening furlong and continued strongly to wire, easily. ROCKWOOD, Lasiter followed in closest pursuit of winner, showed good speed, and fought it out courageously under hard drive. BRAVO CARUSO was hard urged while holding a contending position and was slowly making up ground at close.

THIRD RACE—Seven furlongs. Purse, $1,000; claiming. For 4-year-olds and upward. Start good. Won driving; place, same. Went to post at 3:21. Off at 3:31. Winner, Ryland H. New's b. g. CANTER BOY, sent up fast on inside to hold position with leaders, came to outside entering home stretch, closed stoutly under punishment and was up in the last 70 yards. VOTE BOY had edge at speed while settling the pace, in the last 70 yards, but weakened under determined bids from GRANNYS TRADE and fought it out willingly when pushed in closing stages. GRANNYS TRADE had lot of speed to force the pace, challenged strongly, and held on gamely under a hard drive.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—COLUMBIANA, $7.00, $3.30, $2.70; BAY BUBBLE, $3.20, $2.60; LOOKABOUT, $3.00.

COLUMBIANA permitted to settle in full stride before moving into contention, betstretch, closed determinedly under strong finish and was up in last sixteenth. BAY BUBBLE stalled off stiff contention from MISS TROPHY in first five furlongs, moved clear in final furlong, but was unable to stall off the winner. LOOKABOUT went in the first flight and responded nicely for the closing drive.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—SABLIN, $3.20, $2.60, $2.30; CORINTO, $3.90, $3.70; CHESHIRE, $2.60.

SABLIN, taken to outside for start, sprinted into long lead in first half-mile, was steadied while setting rapid pace, and held CORINTO safely when mildly urged in final furlong. CORINTO suffered interference by INDIANTOWN in opening sixteenth, recovered quickly to reach contending position approaching final turn, then closed in game fashion when in full stride. CHESHIRE went in first flight and rallied stronly for closing test.

SIXTH RACE—One mile. Purse, $1,000; claiming. For 3-year-olds. Start good. Won driving; place, same. Went to post at 5:09. Off at 5:15. Winner, Francis J. Buchanan's b. c. Two-dollar mutuels paid—TREBOR, $12.90, $7.20, $4.70; CINAR, $14.00, $7.10; BYRDEX, $27.40.

TREBOR, going gamely and in improved form, caused some crowding when moving into contention, opened up a long lead after getting to front and held away to end to win under strong reserve. CINAR, badly blocked at half-mile mark, recovered after pulling back, swung to the outside and finished gamely. BYRDEX raced JACK SNIPE into defeat but had much taken out of him and tired in final drive.

Two-dollar mutuels paid—DRUSUS, $6.70, $4.50, $3.30; TOMFOOLERY, $14.30, $8.60; HURRAY, $13.20.

DRUSUS, going strongly from beginning, engaged leaders when leaving the back stretch, wore HURRAY down in the closing furlong, then drew out slowly under strong urging. TOMFOOLERY, well placed in the early running, came to the outside when making his run and closed with good energy. HURRAY was used up racing with DUNFOX and tired during the final furlong under punishment.

Silver Slumps To 45¾ Cents, 18-Month Low

Drop of 3 Cents Follows London Decline to 42.43.

By the Associated Press.

New York, Jan. 17.—Imported bar silver dropped 3 cents a fine ounce to 45¾ cents in New York today, the lowest level since July 30, 1934. The quotation, posted by Handy & Harmon, bullion brokers, followed a decline of ⅞ of a penny to 19 pence a standard ounce in London, which was equivalent to 42.43 cents in New York.

The decline was the most severe since last December 18, when a similar reduction was made, and was believed in metal circles to have resulted from a lowering of the United States Treasury's bid to an approximate figure.

The fresh and drastic decline in the world price of the metal served to throw back into financial focus the whole range of the silver situation that has troubled international quarters for the past 6 months, or since the United States Treasury abruptly withdrew support from the London market where it had been operating since the summer of 1934 in carrying out terms of the silver purchase act.

After holding at 65⅜ cents an ounce from August 15, 1935, the price dropped ⅝ of a cent on December 9 and has since been lowered gradually to the present level, only 4 cents above the 1934 low of 41¾ cents, and 35¼ cents down from the 1935 high of 81 cents.

Mexican Silver.

A series of conferences between United States and Mexican officials resulted in an agreement rumored to call for United States purchases of silver in the southern republic, the world's largest producer, at an unstated premium above the world price. It has been revealed, however, that the Treasury paid between 49 cents and 50 cents an ounce for Mexican silver, about the world quotation.

One reaction to the latest turn in silver affairs was the appointment of a committee of five U. S. Representatives from the silver mining Western States to confer with Senate silver leaders on plans for stabilizing world prices. Representative Martin (Democrat), Colorado, head of the committee, in commenting on its work, said: "We ought to get together and determine what is back of the continued decline in the price of silver."

By the Associated Press.

Chicago, Jan. 17. — Estimates pointing to big export purchases in Canada totaling 2,750,000 bushels in the past 24 hours helped give a firmer tone to wheat values today. Bullish significance was attached to the fact that Winnipeg and Minneapolis led upturns of prices.

The Market

By Carlton A. Shively, A Special Correspondent.

Trading Tone Holds Steady in Lower Volume of Transactions; Silver Breaks.

New York, Jan. 17.—In the second smallest turnover of the year, amouting to 2,357,116 shares, the stock market managed to hold a steady tone, but recent fast moving stocks were kept well under control. Prices were well mixed at the close, with a tendency to work above the poorest of the day. Government bonds were firm. Others were less active. French francs dipped a little. May wheat closed a quarter of a cent higher at 100⅝ cents a bushel.

If the stock market had any feature it was the subsidence of the excited trading in low-priced shares and the strength in preferred issues. Many of them moved up in a rather thin market. Two or three of the low-pricers maintained their strength and one, Newport Industries, was shoved up to a new high price, accompanied by much talk, including a rumor that another chemical company was interested.

Farm Implements Rise.

Trading in rails was mixed. Union Pacific weakened, but Great Northern and Central were firm. R-K-O was an active amusement and Warner Bros. picked up, an earning statement to show improvement being expected. Motor issues were firm, as were utilities. Some sharp movements took place among the farm implements, on the outlook for a fresh farm bonus effort. Deere continued into new high ground and there was further buying of Advance Rumely, although the company is virtually out of business.

Most of the cigar company stocks were strong. Cuban American preferred lifted its gain for the past two sessions to 10 points before feeling profit-taking sales. Advances of 2 to 8 points were scored for Crucible, Gotham, Lorillard, Armour of Illinois, Minneapolis-Honeywell, Otis Steel, Ruberoid and Underwood preferred. Airplane issues turned active and higher in the last hour's trading. Silver shares broke 1 to 4 points on the sinking of the metal quotation. Steels were a bit weak, with profit taking in Bethlehem. Small losses were taken in tobaccos, coppers and equipments. Radio jumped to a new high.

Silver Price Breaks.

While Representatives were talkover what to do about the farm vote, the markets were stirred a little by a sharp drop in silver metal, that is, the domestic price for foreign silver. Following resumption of price reduction yesterday the Treasury cut another 3 cents from silver today.

Months ago the President and the Secretary of the Treasury justified several successive increases in the Treasury price for newly mined silver on the ground that their buying price ought to keep pace with the world price. To be logical the spread of more than 30 cents in open market and newly mined Treasury silver ought to bring down the latter price sharply.

Catching Up.

However, logic probably will be tempered with politics, and no such blow is likely to be delivered, with the election so near, to the handful of silver mine operators, smelters, silver Senators and their friends. Some even suggest that the domestic price for newly mined silver might be increased. The best to hope for is that the whole business will be thrown overboard.

Figures made public by the Secretary of the Treasury disclosed that the Government had purchased 835,000,000 ounces of silver from all sources under the proclamation of December, 1933, the nationalization order of August, 1934, and the silver purchase act of June, 1934. This makes it possible to figure out what progress the Treasury has made in operations which look much akin to those of a dog chasing its tail. On the basis of $10,123,000,000 of monetary gold on December 27, silver required to make silver reserves one-quarter of total metallic reserves would be 2,615,000,000 ounces. That is figuring silver at $1.29 an ounce.

At the start of the silver purchasing operations we had 417,000,000 ounces of bullion and coin and 73,000,000 in the general fund, to which should now be added the 835,000,000 ounces purchased, a total of 1,325,000,000 ounces. Deducting the 1,325,000,000 from the 2,615,000,000 leaves 1,290,000,000 ounces still needed, if subsidiary silver coin be not included. If it be included, purchases still required to be made would be 1,060,000,000 ounces. At most, then, the Treasury has caught up only about 250,000,000 ounces by purchasing 835,000,000, because of the growth in monetary gold stocks. If purchases continue at the current rate of 100,000,000 ounces monthly, and if gold imports taper off, as they are now doing, more rapid progress may be made. But for what good purpose?

Manipulation.

What the Treasury is up to in manipulating its balances in its member and Federal Reserve bank accounts is almost as much a mystery as is the manipulation of silver. In the week ended January 15 the Treasury deposited in the Reserve banks $65,000,000 of gold certificates, whereas only $14,000,000 of new monetary gold came in. The difference probably was free gold, accumulated through recent imports. If the certificates so deposited were to be spent, the spending would increase member bank excess reserves. As if to offset such expenditure, the Treasury issued a call upon its member bank balances for some $64,000,000, payable next Monday. A similar call, which was paid yesterday, was for $61,000,000. With the balances in the Reserve banks ranging around $500,000,000 obviously the Treasury does not need the money it has requisitioned from member banks.

Offset Temporary.

By offsetting its own excess reserve-increasing operations by reduction operations, it has been argued, the Treasury can save the Reserve banks and the Reserve Board the embarrassment which might be caused if it did not offset the increased reserves it created. Yet, since neither the banks nor the board have yet taken a stand, it could hardly be said that they might be ambarrassed. It should be the intention of the Treasury to offset all the increase in reserves caused by its own operations, its balances in member banks would allow such a policy only for a short period. Larger results could be obtained by borrowing new money and requiring payment in cash. The present policy, if it is one, could have no relation to preparation for payment of a soldier bonus, which would not be called for before June. During the week ended Wednesday excess reserves rose $90,000,000. Calls issued since then have canceled $125,000,000 of the excess.

Steel.

Bethlehem's comprehensive plan for merging subsidiaries into one operating organization, and the payment of accumulative preferred stock dividends with a fresh stock offering, is another movement along the road now being followed by many companies, and one destined to become well rut-worn. Naturally, attention is centering on United States Steel. The preferred stock also has some dividend arrears to look after, and the operating rate is close to the point at which it probably is possible for the corporation to earn full requirements. Already a good deal has been done in scrapping unused and obsolete plants and in securing greater cohesion. Whether U. S. Steel plans the formation of one operating unit, eliminating the holding organization, and whether the preferred shares will get new stock or cash for the arrears is a matter which it is too early to say, but doubtless much speculation will center around the subject.

Howard U. Power Plant Nearly Ready for Use

Under supervision of Albert Cassell, architect, the third building provided by Congressional enactment as a part of Howard University's 20-year physical development program is nearing completion through PWA appropriations. It is a high-tension heat, light and power plant, designed to serve the needs of the university and Freedmen's Hospital for the next quarter century.

Costing approximately $550,000, the building is 78 feet in height, covers 8,563 square feet, and has a chimney of 10-foot diameter which rises 125 feet above the sidewalk. The plant will have an ultimate capacity of 4,000 horsepower. It will be directly connected with the teaching program of the school of engineering and architecture, for purposes of demonstration and mechanical engineering apprenticeship.

The plant will require one chief engineer with first-class license, and four assistants with first or second-class licenses, in accordance with District rules. Applicants for these positions are being reviewed by university trustees, and are being made through the office of V. D. Johnston, university treasurer.

Bette Davis, Master Bartholomew and the Giant McLaglen Are New Bills' Stars

Political Tale Of Royal House Is Fox Feature

Freddie, Vic Swell Team; Bette Davis Hit at Earle; Other Programs.

By Nelson B. Bell.

"PROFESSIONAL SOLDIER." Twentieth Century-Fox picturization of a story by Damon Runyon, adapted to the screen by Gene Fowler and Howard Ellis Smith, co-starring Freddie Bartholomew and Victor McLaglen, with Gloria Stuart, Constance Collier, Michael Whalen, C. Henry Gordon, Pedro de Cordoba, Lumsden Hare, Walter Kingsford, Dixie Dunbar, Lester Mathews and Rollo Lloyd. Directed by Tay Garnett. Reviewed Friday night.

Here is fantastic "mythical kingdom" melodrama, decorated with such a wealth of spontaneous comedy, made the beneficiary of such expert character delineation and so handsomely filmed that its net impression is one of superlative entertainment.

The amazing finesse of the young gentleman who made so profound an impression in the title role of "David Copperfield," Master Freddie Bartholomew, a juvenile actor with a veteran's command of all the intricacies of his craft, is pretty well taken for granted by this time. He betrays no recession from his previous precociousness in this subject, as the young king who is made the victim of a coup d'etat to which Michael Donovan, "professional soldier," refuses to lend his full support once he discovers that he has been pitted against a kindergartner instead of a mature and full-fledged ruler, capable of making it a fight.

McLaglen Repeats.

This Donovan fellow is played with an impressive reflection of the skill he betrayed in "The Informer" by Victor McLaglen, whose stature as an actor of the first flight constantly is growing in artistic dimensions.

This huge McLaglen, whose ability to knock antagonistic gentlemen cold with either a right or a left is one of the prime exhibits the films have to offer, initiates the present goings-on by virtually wrecking a smart night club in Paris, to which his erstwhile ward is dedicating too much of the family bankroll to suit his pleasure.

The way my good friend Mr. McLaglen bangs people around is a delight to the eye, but probably something less than that to the jaw!

And then he is commissioned to kidnap a king, hold him until a rebellious and seditious cabinet can make up its mind what to do with the State and then restore him to a restricted and thoroughly circumscribed throne.

Mr. McLaglen relishes the job until his discovery that the king, Peter II, is a youngster surrounded by all of the distressing inhibitions of closely guarded royal youth.

So he instructs the enthusiastic youngster, who feels sure that he has fallen under the sinister dominance of the late Mr. Dillinger, Public Enemy No. 1, and an accomplice from Chicago's less sympathetic precincts, and is proportionately thrilled, in the game of baseball, inducts him into the mysteries of the noble art of the "galloping dominoes," at which he all but loses his shirt, and otherwise proves himself a pretty swell guy.

In the meantime, of course, there is the romance between Donovan's henchman, George Foster, and the Countess Sonia, guardian of the small king, and the mildly acid rivalry between Mr. Donovan and the junior king's nurse, Augusta, played with her accustomed artistry by Constance Collier.

Is a Competent Fable.

There is a world of fun in this ridiculous fable, which does for the young Mr. Bartholomew about what the same author's "Little Miss Marker" did for the even more tiny Shirley Temple.

It is an interesting contrast that is drawn between the almost incomprehensibly articulate Master Bartholomew and his rough-and-ready fellow-Englishman, Victor McLaglen, in this picture. I can think of no more shrewd an alignment of divergent talents than this film affords—McLaglen, the giant braggart; Freddie, the cultured little gentleman, always ready to listen to his kidnaper's fabulous tales and never believing any of them!

The stage bill at Loew's Fox this week does not lag for behind the screen fare in excellence. Headlining the bill is one of the most dynamic young women to have come to the boards in years—Kazanova and Her Tziganes, a band of 15 male instrumentalists who provide a colorful and strikingly melodious background for her vibrant work as a solo violiniste.

Is an Exotic Act.

From the inclusion of a symbalon and other distinctly identifying instruments in the orchestra, I take it to be Hungarian. But I still would not lay more than 11 to 10 that it is not Russian. At any rate, their music is fascinatingly different and Kazanova is a dynamo of energetic musicianship that will engage the attention of even the most blase of the theatergoers.

Adding a touch of the craziest comedy ever seen on a Washington stage to the bill is Frank Libuse, a pianist and flutist, who is assisted in his endeavor to achieve new heights of lunacy by a charming young coloratura who evidently can sing a great deal better than the extravagantly "nut" act gives her any appreciable opportunity to demonstrate.

Maximo is a wizard on the slack wire, surpassing anything that has been seen here heretofore in the matter of precarious equilibrium and a defiance of all the fairly stable laws of gravity.

Singer From Radio.

Charles Carlile, borrowed from the airways, reveals a pleasant tenor voice, heard to advantage in such popular numbers as "The Piccolino," "With All My Heart," "Music Goes Round and Round," "Red Sails in the Sunset," "Alone" and "Moon Over Miami."

The Fox Movietone News and another of Phil Lampkin's sharply contrasted medley overtures augment a feature that may be relied upon for an hour or two of fine fun and a further exposition of the extraordinary abilities of two actors whose talents even yet probably have not been fully recognized or appreciated.

Soon to Make Her Cinema Debut

Many seasoned playgoers are anxiously awaiting the screen debut of Gladys Swarthout, star of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, to see what manner of "musical" may have been made of "The Rose of the Rancho," the first of the Frances Starr stellar vehicles under the aegis of the late David Belasco. As contrived by Richard Walton Tully and Belasco, "The Rose" was a romantic drama blistering under the subtropic suns of lower California. It possessed all of the color of setting, fire and flamboyant effect to make a fine libretto. It will be interesting to determine whether or not it has, with Miss Swarthout and John Boles in the pivotal roles. However, it will not be long to wait.

"DANGEROUS." Warner Brothers' picturization of a story by Laird Doyle, starring Bette Davis, supported by Franchot Tone, Margaret Lindsay, Alison Skipworth, Dick Foran and John Eldredge. Directed by Alfred E. Green. Reviewed Friday night by Dorothea Lewis.

I am going to shake hands with the Devil!

That is what you do when you help Joyce Heath, according to the flicker "Dangerous," and if there is anything that I can say to help praise Joyce, as she is played by Bette Davis, I'm going to say it with emphasis and pleasure—demons or no demons.

Here is a really superlative performance, a well-rounded, complete character, projected intelligently, vividly and excitingly. I thought the hysterical chants to Miss Davis in "Of Human Bondage" were pitched too high, surprised way up into the treble by the simple facts that Bette was willing to look like a fury, act like one and sound like one. I thought she overplayed.

But as Joyce Heath, jinxed actress, bitter, tempestuous, fascinating, lovable and hateable, she does not once overplay, in spite of temptations at times from overwritten lines and situations. I'm up in the treble now, myself.

Star Better Than Play.

The play, on the whole good, may have its melodramatic moments, but she won't admit it, and makes them natural, even trite renunciation scenes. She is better than her picture but the character and the character portrayal are so interesting that you shouldn't miss "Dangerous."

Joyce has slipped about as far as she can from the very high place she had reached in the theater, when young Don Bellows rescues her, through gratitude for what her art had meant to him. Eventually, he loves her and with that love comes all the danger and bad luck that has followed her all her life.

The picture is courageous enough to dare an unhappy ending, eased a bit with a little of the "Magnificent Obsession's" philosophy—that to give to others can restore balance to one's own life.

Franchot Tone is a very good choice for Don, sure and unsure by turn, crisp and sincere in the role—though he always seems to be slamming doors. Margaret Lindsay is lovely to look at as his fiancee, but not half so interesting as Bette. Alison Skipworth is her usual delightful self.

Would It Be Eagels.

Whether or not Joyce Heath is meant to be the also sadly jinxed Jeanne Eagels I do not know, but I began to suspect, just because Jeanne's name is dragged in as one of two actresses who could play a certain role—Joyce is the other mentioned! They can't put me off the track like that.

The stage show is one about which you're tempted to say, "Oh, it's all right," though Cross and Dunn's rendition of "Lazy Bones" is considerably better than all right, and their whole act is pleasant. Floyd Christy and his partner are better than their material; the Aristocrats are graceful, if unexciting dancers, and the Walkmirs boast of a gentleman all done up in amazing spangles, who goes in for excellent balancing and "feats of strength."

Audrey Seiber looks lovely in black and even more so in white, and Bert Granoff starts everything off with some Dick Powell songs. But this is really Bette Davis week, with Bette proving herself an actress to be reckoned with—and making me anxious to see her as romantic, passionate little Gabby in "The Petrified Forest."

The Washington section of the Socialist Labor Party will hold a public lecture tonight at the Thomas Circle Club, 1326 Massachusetts avenue northwest. The speaker will be Al Teichert, of Philadelphia, and his topic, "Industrial Unionism."

"A TALE OF TWO CITIES." Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picturization of the novel by Charles Dickens, adapted to the screen by W. P. Lipscomb and J. N. Behrman, starring Ronald Colman, with Elizabeth Allan, Edna May Oliver, Reginald Owen, Basil Rathbone, Blanche Yurka, Henry B. Walthall, Donald Woods, Walter Catlett, Fritz Leiber, H. B. Warner, Mitchell Lewis, Claude Gillingwater, Billie Bevan, Isabel Jewell, Tully Marshall, Lucille LaVerne, E. E. Clive, Robert Warwick, Ralf Harolde, Thomas Ricketts and Donald Haines. Directed by Jack Conway. Reviewed (second week) by W. A. Whitney.

A great human document—of a nation's struggle for "Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite"—was given to the world when Charles Dickens wrote "A Tale of Two Cities."

Now that story takes on added vitality and interest as the cinematographic transcription recreates upon the screen that beautifully strange love story set against a background of as parlous an era as any nation ever faced.

Little can be added to the approbation printed in these columns on January 9: "'A Tale of Two Cities' I should place as nearly in the class of the masterpiece as anything the cameras and microphones have conspired to formulate."

Superlative in performance, as well as in investiture, this is indeed a triumph of the motion picture; a production which all lovers of Dickens, the theater and the arts in general can ill afford to miss.

Supplementing the feature—as if such a feature needed supplementing!—are a Chic Sale comedy, a musical subject, "Audioscopiks," and a release of the Metrotone News.

RKO-Keith's

"THE MAGNIFICENT OBSESSION." Universal picturization of the novel by Lloyd C. Douglas, adapted to the screen by George O'Neil, Sarah Y. Mason and Victor Herman, starring Irene Dunne, with Robert Taylor, Charles Butterworth, Betty Furness, Beryl Mercer, Arthur Treacher, Cora Sue Collins, Lucien Littlefield, Theodore von Eltz, Arthur Hoyt, Crawford Kent, Henry Armetta and scores more. Directed by John M. Stahl. Reviewed, second week, by Sally Stroud.

"The Magnificent Obsession," now in its second week, continues to draw huge crowds. All kinds of people are interested in this story of a philosophy of living. Whether the scoffers remain to pray, I do not know. But at least there is a chance they might be made thoughtful.

The plot of the story has to do with the magnificent obsession of one Dr. Wayne Hudson; an obsession that true happiness might be attained through unselfish giving of self, money or help. Providing no one is told of the gift.

The exponent of this theory, Dr. Hudson, does not appear in the story. But willing disciples carry the torch he lighted. Eventually, even the boy who unwittingly caused his death forsakes the primrose path for the rugged road of duty.

Morgan and Cast Excel.

This is only the scantiest outline of the plot. Frank Morgan has an extremely good part as a stonecutter, who lives according to the tenets of the magnificent obession theory. Charles Butterworth is Poopsie to the last inch, the fiance of Dr. Hudson's charming daughter, Joyce (Betty Furness). Nancy Ashford, the nurse, is played by Sara Haden with delicate restraint. Henry Armetta appears briefly in a ribtickling scene. Gregory, the valet of Mr. Bobbie, is enacted notably by Arthur Treacher.

Putting the "obsession" into words is difficult, but one can assimilate phrases that make a sort of entity: "Jesus evolved the idea of generating human power." "One follows a definite formula: Find those who need help and give them help." "It must be done with secrecy." "Through one, all may be reached."

Metropolitan

"CAPTAIN BLOOD." First National picturization of the novel by Rafael Sabatini, with screen play by Casey Robinson, featuring Errol Flynn and Olivia de Havilland, with Robert Barrat, Lionel Atwill, Ross Alexander, Forrester Harvey, Guy Kibbee, David Torrence, Donald Meek, Hobart Cavanaugh, Holmes Herbert, Henry Stephenson, Basil Rathbone and E. E. Clive. Directed by Michael Curtiz. Reviewed (second week return engagement) by W. A. Whitney.

Only slightly less stark than "Mutiny On the Bounty," "Captain Blood" stands well up in that company of distinguished pictures whose common characteristic is an engrossing, compelling sea story.

As the drama of this Jesse James of the high seas progresses, a wealth of story material is unfolded, woven into a real, fascinating whole by the dynamic Errol Flynn in the title role of the brilliant young surgeon, condemned to a life of slavery in the West Indies, later escaping to become the most notorious pirate on the Spanish Main.

Cast Makes Star Shine.

Excellent in his own right, Mr. Flynn has the rare distinction of being even the greater actor in the reflected brilliance of a supporting company which any Lloyds would unhesitatingly declare a No. 1.

While not all the personnel can be mentioned—even though each deserves it—special notation might be made of the work of Olivia de Haviland, as the daughter of the island's biggest planter; of Lionel Atwill, as that vengeful boss; of Basil Rathbone, as Col. Levasseur, another pirate of parts, and George Hassell as the gout-afflicted governor.

For contrast to this stirring drama, there is Red Nichols and his orchestra playing a cycle of "Southland" songs and the combined releases of the Paramount and Universal newsreels.

RED-LETTER days: The first time I ever took a girl to a Broadway restaurant, Lorber's, near Thirty-ninth street . . . Train fares, theater tickets and taxis had eaten heavily into my slim bankroll, and cold sweat stood on my brow as the waiter brought the check, face downward . . . I aged several years before turning it over, because if it had been more than $2, they would have had to call a policeman.

The first tailored suit . . . My uncle took me to New York to get it as a graduation present, the entire family being pleasantly startled when Sister Theresa said that I'd made the grade in the State Regents . . . We went to the House of Morrison, and I've never forgotten th place, because the slogan was, and probably still is: "It Fits Well Around the Neck." . . . I was very disappointed to learn that a tailored suit required several days to complete . . . So I went back home wearing a suit that didn't fit well around the neck . . . In fact, I saw a picture of myself recently . . . Even my neck didn't fit too well.

The story that saved my job on the Evening Mail . . . Hughie Fullerton, I think, was ready to sack his college sports editor . . . In despair, he assigned me to the 1920 Westminster Kennel Club show at Madison Square Garden . . . The place was hideous with canine yelps and howls . . . The program offered no help . . . With no technical knowledge, I wrote a story of the imaginary reactions of an imaginary little girl going around the show with her mother . . . I left it on Lorry Jacobs' desk in the sports department and sneaked away, confident that if there was any doubt as to my being fired, this unprofessional story would solve it . . . When I came in the next morning, Fullerton rushed to meet me at the elevator: "A classic, Sully, a classic," he boomed . . . That was a life saver, and I've loved dogs ever since.

The only job I was ever fired from, the World . . . George Daley was sports editor, and he had played baseball at Union College with my Uncle Charles, who was one of the great ball players in Union history . . . "That hurts me terribly, Sullivan," said Mr. Daley, "but you have betrayed the paper by not showing up here on time, and I've got to let you go" . . . As I was walking out the door he said: "Remember me to your uncle!" That is the funniest tag line ever uttered . . . Hype Igoe told me to return the next day and go to work, but I wanted to see Florida.

I've never been able to look as thoug I had money . . . I went in once to look at an Isotta-Fraschini car . . . The salesman wouldn't even talk to me, and I slunk out . . . At Miami four of us were betting as a syndicate . . . With the pool's money I went to the $100 betting window . . . The guard stopped me . . . "This is the HUNDRED DOLLAR window," he said . . . Two well-looking girls started snickering. I glared at him haughtily, but it was no go . . . I had that $2-window look . . . If he had only kept me out, it would have saved the $100.

The first moving picture I ever made, a two-reeler with Johnny Weissmuller for Larry Kent at Paramount . . . It was finally released and it was pretty bad . . . Three times I hurried to theaters where it was playing, each time to learn that it had been taken out after the first showing . . . Then "Mr. Broadway," on which I worked harder than I'd ever worked in my life . . . Was probably the worst thing ever made, and I've still to receive a cent for it . . . They rent it out now to haunt houses . . . Yes sir, just a matinee idol.

My first vaudeville appearance, at the New York Paramount . . . Block and Sully put on my make-up, Bill Gaxton and Victor Moore edited my monologue, and I hired Eddy Duchin's valet, because I figured all actors had valets . . . I was violently ill all week long, Couldn't eat a thing . . . When I left the theater, I weighed 129 pounds, and the audience had lost weight, too.

Most shocking experience: The night at Asbury Park when all of us on the beach thought we saw a human hand beckoning from one of the scorched portholes of the S. S. Morro Castle . . . It developed that the "hand" was a piece of loosened paint flapping in the wind, but I'll never rid my ears of the terrible cry from thousands on the beach, a cry wrenched from horrified hearts . . . In line with that, the experience at Sing Sing, when a trusty kept bringing me notes during the show we were staging . . . "C. C. wants Rudy Vallee to sing 'Boulevard of Broken Dreams'" . . . Finally I reprimanded the trusty for annoying me with the request of a single prisoner . . . "No, no," he protested. "C. C. means condemned cells. The death house is listening in over a special wire."

The loneliest trip I ever made: Running away to Chicago to join the U. S. Marines, during the war . . . It should have been high adventure, but it was a wretched experience in homesickness . . . To any of you kids who are thinking of running away, take my advice and don't do it . . . It's overrated, and Pullman porters get very mad if you cry in an upper berth, because you wake them up.

Culbertson On Bridge

A Magnificent Bid.

If I were serving as the judge to determine the best bid hand of the year—a sort of Pulitzer or Nobel prize in the field of contract bridge—I should unhesitatingly award the palm to Mr. Albert Morehead, of New York. He was my partner, sitting South, when the following remarkable deal occurred.

West, dealer.
North-South vulnerable.

NORTH
♦ A

WEST
♠ J 10 7
♦ K 7 5

EAST
♠ None
♥ J 10 9 7
♦ Q J 10
♣ J 9 8 7 6 5

SOUTH
♠ 5 4 3 2
♦ 9 8 6 4 3 2

The bidding:

West	North	East	South
1 club	2 clubs	5 clubs	Pass
6 clubs	7 clubs	Pass	7 diam'ds
Pass	7 hearts	Pass	7 spades*

*Final bid.

As sensational as the bidding was, it was no less logical. My own overcall of opponents' suit was, of course, the only possible choice on the first round. East's jump to five clubs was justified by his extraordinary distribution and the desire to shut out communications between myself and my partner. Obviously, Mr. Morehead could not make a free bid over five clubs. West's six bid really was of a defensive character—he felt that it was his best procedure to anticipate a slam bid by his vulnerable opponents and, possibly, induce a contract in the wrong suit. (He nearly succeeded.)

With my terrific holding I was not satisfied with a measly small slam. I knew that a grand slam was assured if I could find South with four cards in either major suit. Hence, my second cue bid, at the range of seven! South's response was logical—he bid his six card diamond suit. Now came the crux of the hand: How many players would read my seven heart bid correctly? Mr. Morehead did. His perfect analysis was as follows: North's seven club cue bid forces a grand slam. The only problem is to find the right suit. Obviously seven diamonds is not it, because North has taken that bid out to seven hearts. But North, if he could be sure of making seven hearts, would not have troubled with a seven club cue bid—then the heart bid must be an "asking bid." North insists that I choose between hearts and spades.

So, on the magnificent four card suit of 5 4 3 2. Mr. Morehead bid seven spades and earned my gratitude and admiration! His reasoning was flawless, and we were rewarded by making our contract without difficulty.
